TRIBUTES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate I should like to take advantage of this, the first opportunity that has been accorded to this body to offer a word of tribute to and appreciation of the life and work of the Honourable Thomas Clement Douglas, P.C., B.A., M.A., LL.D. I suppose that, as a westerner, I had to be conscious of Tommy Douglas for many a long year. We, in Manitoba, are rather proud of the fact that he was a graduate of Brandon College, now the University of Brandon. Regardless of political affiliation, we followed his activities as an M.P., in the first instance, then as M.L.A., afterwards as Premier of Saskatchewan and, after that, his record as Leader of the New Democratic Party in the national field.

I have the most vivid memory of my first meeting with Mr. Douglas, which was at what was then called the Dominion-Provincial conference in 1958. I attended it for the first time to represent the province of Manitoba, while he was already a seasoned veteran as the representative of the province of Saskatchewan. I always remember the clarity with which he presented his ideas, the cogency of his arguments and the appeal of the policies that he was recommending for consideration at those conferences. I venture to say that Mr. Douglas was the most distinguished premier that the province of Saskatchewan has had and was certainly an ornament to the sentiment of western Canada.

His achievements, of course, are well known. His work in the development of social policy and as a social pioneer was of landmark proportions and has affected the life of every Canadian in our country today. His understanding of human nature and of human needs was, indeed, remarkable and was, I think, one of the great secrets of his success in public life. He brought a civility to politics which we sometimes miss these days. I never heard him, nor, indeed, have I ever heard of him speaking in harsh or unpleasant terms about political matters. His gifts as a raconteur and as an orator were certainly very persuasive in stimulating the people of his province to support him both federally and provincially over many long years.

He was the first national leader of the NDP, to which he gave his usual distinguished concentration. He was an unforgettable actor on the national scene and, in my opinion, one of the great Canadian statesmen of his generation. I am sure this house would like Mrs. Douglas and his two daughters to know that the Senate notes the passing of this great Canadian with respect and affection.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has spoken so eloquently and accurately about the late Mr. T. C. Douglas that it is unnecessary for me to add anything very much except our support for the comments he has made. The Leader of the Government has mentioned the western roots of Mr. Douglas and pointed out that they exerted an important influence on his life. But Mr. Douglas was, in fact, well known in every part of Canada. As honourable senators know, he travelled frequently in the Atlantic provinces and in other parts of Canada as leader of his party. So, while he was appreciated for his western roots, he also reflected a Canadianism that was greatly appreciated.

Honourable senators, even politics, as it is practised today in Canada, is becoming increasingly bureaucratized so that often political parties, political leaders and even members of Parliament depend upon elaborate systems of research and support staffs to establish for them their ideas and their policies. Mr. Douglas became a star in the political firmament in his own right and his stardom flowed from his personal convictions and from his personal philosophy. He did not have to rely upon a flow of information or ideas from outside sources for the nourishment of his convictions, those convictions which he carried to accomplishment. As premier of his own province and, later, as leader of his party and as a member of the House of Commons, he constantly kept his ideas and his convictions before his colleagues.

Mr. Douglas completed his service in the House of Commons as a member of Parliament, having stepped down as leader of his party, and served as energy critic, in which capacity he followed the events of the House with the interest and the passion that he had demonstrated when he was leader of his party.

I had the opportunity to know Mr. Douglas and together with other members of the House of Commons remember him for his wit, his geniality, his accessibility and the way in which he maintained his own point of view without making it difficult for others.

Honourable senators, I add my words of support to those of the Leader of the Government and join particularly in the expression of condolences which he has offered to Mr. Douglas' bereaved family.

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I join in the tributes paid by the Leader of the Government and the Leader of the Opposition.

I first met Mr. Douglas when he introduced me at a public meeting in Regina after I was elected in 1945. After that, I could only be his friend and we were friends for many years.

I rise today to say a few words in tribute to a great Canadian. Tommy Douglas was one of a small band of social reformers who enriched the life of his country. Over the last few days, we have heard much praise of him from leaders and from the common people. That is in keeping with the man himself. He was the leader of a great political movement; he was an outstanding provincial premier; and he has rightly been called "The Father of Medicare." I can think of no greater tribute.

When he transferred his energies to the federal scene, Tommy Douglas continued to work tirelessly for social progress. I am convinced that the broad social programs which we know today would have been very different without Tommy Douglas' impetus.

His public record is known to all. As I recall him, Tommy Douglas was a gentle man; powerful in debate but always fair and always generous. I never heard him utter an unkind word. Prejudice was foreign to his nature. Although he suffered disappointment in his political life, and he must often have been discouraged, he was never downcast. He believed firmly in human perfectibility and was convinced that with faith and hard work anything was possible. That is a good philosophy. Tommy Douglas was never afraid to stand for what he believed to be right. He never courted popularity at the expense of principle. He lived according to his conscience. I am glad to remember him today.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, as a lifetime member of the exclusive Premier's Club of the 1960s, I would like to add a few words to what has been said about the late Tommy Douglas. I certainly subscribe to what the Leader of the Opposition, the Leader of the Government and Senator Croll have said about him. I also subscribe to all of what has been credited to him in the media over the past few days. Tommy Douglas was a remarkable man in many ways. It has been said that it would be difficult for him to forgive his enemies—simply because he had none! This comment struck me because I believe it is accurate. It was difficult to become an enemy of Tommy Douglas.

Tommy Douglas always delivered his message with wit and in a humorous way. I remember one occasion, and I believe it was in 1961 or 1962, when the ten premiers were facing the then Prime Minister, the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker, at a federal-provincial conference. Of course, it was to deal with tax sharing arrangements and, as is traditional, all the premiers wanted a larger portion of the pie. Premier W.A.C. Bennett of British Columbia said at one point that his government needed a lot more money because a lot of senior citizens were moving to British Columbia from Saskatchewan because of the climate. When it came time for Tommy Douglas to speak, he said that what Premier Bennett had said was absolutely true—that a lot of people move to British Columbia from Saskatchewan because of the climate, "but we need more money in Saskatchewan because most of them come back because of the weather." That was Tommy Douglas' way of communicating a message and he used it time and time again.

I am sure that all Canadians are benefiting today from his contributions to our society. I join with all those who have expressed condolences to his widow, to his children, to the members of the New Democratic Party and all those people who had a special affection for Tommy Douglas.

Hon. D. G. Stuart: Honourable senators, as I read the newspapers and listened to what has been said about the late Tommy Douglas in this house, I sometimes wondered if we were talking about the same man that I knew for all those years. Senator Roblin and Senator Robichaud said they could not imagine that he could ever say an unkind word to anyone. My God, they never sat in the legislature opposite Tommy Douglas. I can recall Ross Thatcher saying that if you had a debate with Tommy Douglas, he took the hide off you layer by layer and your own wife never spoke to you for about two weeks after he was finished with you.

I got into politics because of Tommy Douglas. If someone said he cannot imagine Tommy Douglas having an enemy, then, by god, at times, I could not imagine Tommy Douglas having a friend. He stood for everything that I stood against—and I never won a battle! That was part of the reason I disliked him so much. From 1944 to 1964 we did not win even one tiny battle against him.

The honourable senator from Regina could also mention one or two things. There was the odd person who disliked Tommy Douglas over the years. He used to say about things like that: "You can't make an omelette if you don't break a few eggs." Well, you could look at some of the broken eggs here—and Senator Barootes is one of the broken eggs that went into making Tommy's omelettes.

I got into politics because of Tommy, because I wanted to defeat him—but I never succeeded. But I stayed on; "I came to scorn and stayed to pray." I stayed on and developed a great admiration for what he did, and, in fact, we became good friends. So I would like to join others in saying that while there was the odd little imperfection in Tommy Douglas—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Stuart: —he did take the steam out of taking the hide off you with a lot of good humour. We had many an interesting exchange, I can assure you—none of which I ever won. I could win one or two now, but it would not be fair, because he would be answering from up above and still get the best of me, I am sure. I would like to join others in saying how much he will be missed and what a great Canadian he was. I, too, offer to his wife and family our condolences and our best wishes.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, as a Saskatchewan citizen who knew Tommy Douglas, I wish to express a few words of personal remembrance in tribute to and in honour of his life, emphasizing particularly those aspects of his political career that endeared him to millions of Canadians. This diminutive battling Scot was, without doubt, the most colourful, the most beloved and the most admired politician in Saskatchewan's history—notwithstanding Senator Steuart. He possessed that remarkable capacity to expound his social and political views by a special combination of humour, logic and compassion, and in such an articulate, sensitive and simple manner that even those who were not persuaded by his philosophy had been drawn to his convictions; and wherever Tommy spoke enormous crowds came to hear him.

His perorations on a Bobby Burns dinner, or at a St. Andrew's night, left us marvelling at the heights to which his oratorical ability could rise. Always quick in debate, he could, with a witty remark, a repartee or a humorous quip, destroy and disarm his adversary, leaving the audience in laughter and the questioner helpless but unanswered. To this I, as well as Senator Steuart and many others, can attest.

Tommy Douglas was an idealist and a dreamer. His life and views had been highly influenced by the human misery he saw about him in the 1930s, and were also tempered and galvanized by his deep religious beliefs. Therefore, it was not strange to me that initially he could have been characterized as a rebellious and reformist socialist, striving always courageously to undo the economic and human misery that abounded during the 1930s.

Achieving power in Saskatchewan in 1944, his administration was blessed with the prosperity and the economic boom that followed World War II, permitting him to introduce and establish many of the measures that were dear to his heart, even though prosperous times had eradicated much of the earlier misery against which he campaigned. He realized that such good times were not permanent, but that his social programs would endure even into bad times.

Although many of his early commercial schemes in Saskatchewan, which were aimed at balancing our unstable agroeconomics with industry and manufacturing, failed, nevertheless he steadily legislated and pursued his ideals of social reform to improve the fabric of life in his province, and he did that with persuasive tenacity, sincerity and tireless courage. I am pleased to say that, fortunately, he lived to see the results of his efforts.

His interest was always in people and he brought government in Saskatchewan to his people. Despite the manufacturing failures, he brought rural electrification and telephonic services to the small towns and farms, giving modern living standards to those people, and, as you know, he introduced a compulsory automobile insurance program in Saskatchewan, which was not only successful there, but was adopted elsewhere.

Tommy would wish to be best remembered and recognized for the crowning achievement of his many social reform programs, and that was the introduction of hospital and medical care services in Saskatchewan based on the principle of need, not on the principle of ability to pay. This was his proudest accomplishment and one which he had promised himself during his youthful years, and one which he believed would spread to the rest of Canada. In that regard, his predictions were fulfilled.

In the context of social innovation and planning, he was to Saskatchewan, and maybe to the rest of Canada, the equivalent of what Lord Beveridge was to Great Britain in an earlier period. His legacy in this regard will endure beyond the memory of any of these governments of today, and it is a political fact that it can only be undone by any government at the risk of political suicide.

As one who strongly opposed his particular medicare plan, as Senator Steuart will recall, I must admit that there is less political peril in abolishing Christmas in Canada than there is in abolishing medicare. I think Mr. Douglas' commitment to this ideal establishes him, as others have said, as indeed the "Father of Medicare" in Canada.

In this and in all his social reform innovations, Douglas was a cautious Scot. Buoyant economic times may have assisted him in his endeavours, but he never introduced a new social program that his provincial treasury was not able to cover and to finance. This, I must say, is in rather striking contrast to the fiscal integrity shown by other Canadian governments in the past couple of decades.

Moreover, as a prudent politician, Tommy's social programs were always introduced gradually and sequentially, always allowing for a new program to be introduced with the subsequent election.

As with all politicians, aside from his strong social conscience, Tommy Douglas developed the prudence which comes with power, and the radical soon became the quiet reformer, cautious and careful, but always, always seeking to improve the social environment of the people of Canada.

On the eve of introduction of his beloved medicare program, Douglas left Saskatchewan in November 1961 and came to Ottawa. He gave up his position as head of a CCF government, much to the regret of the people of Saskatchewan.

He linked the populist CCF movement to the Canadian Labour Congress, and formed a new party much along the lines of the British Labour Party, as we know it today.

Once in Ottawa, I gradually sensed in Douglas that, despite his toil and travels across this country in his tireless efforts on behalf of his new party, his voice became somewhat muted and his fire a little less bright. There were, however, times when I noticed that the old brilliance returned, particularly as he widened his spectrum to include those matters of foreign policy related to the suffering of emerging and Third World nations.

We in Saskatchewan sometimes felt that Tommy's old zeal and vigour was declining, and, yet, when he returned to our province, his eyes lit up; his voice seemed strengthened and the adoring crowds still turned out to see, to hear and to touch him. It was, honourable senators, pure political alchemy. Last year, Saskatchewan established an Award of Merit, and it was quite fitting that Tommy Douglas should be the first recipient.

Now Tommy Douglas is gone, but his work and his deeds endure. All Canadians have been touched by his actions; all Canada, and especially my province, is a better place for his having been with us, and we know today that it is a sadder and a poorer place for his passing. What better measure is there of a man than that we should be able to say that, because of him, Saskatchewan and Canada is a better place in which to live. He leaves a legacy of accomplishments in Saskatchewan and elsewhere that will live in our memories, and I believe will serve as an inspiration to others who seek to serve in a similar governing capacity.

Thomas Clement Douglas fulfilled his political and Christian destiny. He was a true humanitarian and a great Canadian. He will be fondly remembered and sorely missed by all who knew him. I join in extending my sympathy to his wife, Irma, and to their two daughters, Shirley and Joan.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to join with the others here who have paid a very moving tribute to the late Tommy Douglas. I had the honour and good fortune to know Tommy for many years and to work with him in representing a common area of Saskatchewan. He came to Saskatchewan to the Baptist Church in Weyburn in 1935. He was one of us in Saskatchewan for many years. His ability on the platform as a humorist and a story teller was tremendous, but he also had a particular ability to weave his message in a very understandable way so that, when the meeting was over, people went away feeling that they had acquired a wealth of knowledge because of having attended that meeting. He was the voice of Saskatchewan for many years, the voice of all parts of Saskatchewan, and I think Tommy Douglas, in his own being, was able to represent many parts of the province and many divisions and groups within the province.

Tommy Douglas was raised in an urban atmosphere; he was a trade unionist as a young man; he was a preacher for some years and a political leader for many years. He was, of course, a premier and attended federal-provincial conferences. However, I think that Tommy Douglas, whether as a member of the federal House, a member of the provincial legislature or as a premier, was first and foremost a Canadian with a national perspective who wanted a strong Canada, and what he wanted for Saskatchewan I believe he wanted for every other province in Canada. Whatever battles he was engaged in and whatever issue he might have occupied himself with, one thing would always be clear: That, in the clash of strength, in the clash of the many versus, as in the case of the few or the strong versus the weak, Tommy Douglas was always with the people. He was always putting forth the views of the people. I can remember that many years ago, when I lived in a rural area which had to deal with a severe debt problem, Tommy Douglas, in any negotiations, was on the side of the individual farmer in his battle with the lending institutions so that that farmer, that community and that province might be able to survive.

Although Tommy will, I suppose, be remembered mainly for his contributions as a political leader, he was also, over these many years, a religious leader. He was a minister of the Baptist Church. He did not cease to practise as a clergyman when he went into politics. He did not practise as a clergyman often, in terms of media coverage, and much of his activities would not be well known, but, Sunday after Sunday in Regina, he quietly went off to teach a Sunday school class. This may be unknown to most people, but he was there continuing his work as a religious leader.

Honourable senators, there are many memorial services being held in various parts of Canada. Along with other senators from Saskatchewan, I had the privilege to attend the memorial service in the First Baptist Church in Regina last Friday afternoon. It was an ecumenical service. Church leaders representing Protestant faiths and the Roman Catholic faith spoke at that service. Tommy Douglas was, in the eyes of everyone, a practising Christian. He had kept the faith and had spent his years on earth as a minister of the gospel in a real and fundamental way. The Premier of Saskatchewan delivered the eulogy and it was a most moving tribute. Everyone at that service felt that he spoke for all of Saskatchewan in making his tribute.

Honourable senators, I want to join with others in saying, once again, that Tommy Douglas, in his day, made an enormous contribution to the life of Canada. Medicare will stand as a continuing monument to this man. As our history books are revised in the days ahead, Tommy Douglas' stature will grow and grow because of the immense contribution he made to the social, economic and political life of this country. I also join with others in extending our condolences to this wife, Irma, and to their daughters, Shirley and Joan.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I join with everyone in this chamber, especially my colleagues from Saskatchewan, in paying tribute to the late Tommy Douglas. I am not sure what more can be said, because almost everything that can extol the virtues of this great Canadian has been said. My relationship with Mr. Douglas was not that of political opponent, such as Davey Steuart's or Senator Barootes', nor was it that of colleague, like Senator Argue's. I had the privilege to be the mayor of Saskatoon and to work with him on many occasions in trying to negotiate for my city and others. I always found him easy to get along with, yet generally he was able to win the point that he was after.

As has been said, he was a great story teller. I remember one of his stories about how to cure snake bites. I think that Senator Steuart will recall this one. He was saying that if you walk through the tall Texas grass and a snake bites you on the calf of your leg, you hold it up, squeeze it and a friend will suck out the poison. If the snake bites you in the arm, you do the same thing. Somebody, naturally, asked him, "What happens if the snake bites you on the behind?" He would say, "That's how you can tell who your friends are." He would go on from there to talk about his friends.

Those of us from Saskatchewan recall many vivid and vital memories of Tommy. Although, as I have said, I was not a political supporter of his, it was a privilege to be a friend and admirer. His impact on Saskatchewan and, indeed, on all of Canada will forever be favourably remembered by all who have benefited from his ideas—the ideas that have now been translated into social programs. He was a great parliamentarian. He was able to communicate to the public in a way that was unique. One of the first speeches I ever heard him make advocated the abolition of the Senate. He was not a great friend of this institution, yet he was a great friend of individual senators. I think he really felt that senators had an important role to play. He had many communications with me personally as to what could be done in individual cases.

Tommy Douglas was not a big man physically, but he had a heart that was larger than that of any giant. He felt for lower income people, especially in the area of health care. He really cared for them. I join with my colleagues and with all Canadians in extending to his family my condolences. I was proud to call him a friend.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, will the sponsor of the motion explain the exceptions?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, as I understand the exceptions, they were dealt with in the message that we received from the House of Commons earlier today. I understand that the House has adopted certain amendments to their Standing Orders respecting the various items. Among them is the handling of Vote 15 of the Privy Council, which has been referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages.

As to Parliament Vote 10, it has been referred to the proposed Standing Joint Committee on Parliament. As far as I understand it, there is as yet no Standing Joint Committee on Parliament because the Senate has not yet acted to become a constituent part of it, so the message has been referred to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee. Presumably, they will advise us and recommend the way in which we should handle it. As of now, these two votes are not considered in the overall estimates, but are looked after separately.

Senator Frith: So those two references were made by the House of Commons without asking for our concurrence?

Senator Doody: That is the impression I have.

Senator Roblin: Ultimately, they are asking for our concurrence.

Senator Flynn: It is a joint committee.

Senator Frith: I know.

Senator Doody: You can refuse to join them.

Senator Frith: Matters have been referred to joint committees with concurrence. In fact, it seems to me that they ought to be.

Motion agreed to.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, last Wednesday, February 26, all honourable senators, almost all Canadians and many people outside Canada waited to find out what action the government would take to improve the relationship of the Canadian dollar to the American dollar. The Minister of Finance stated that his budget would result in confidence being restored in fiscal management and that this confidence would be reflected in the dollar relationship. Honourable senators know from listening to the morning news that the dollar is wallowing even deeper in the slough of despondence that it was wallowing in before the budget. Indeed, as of noon today it is one and one-third cents below the position it was at when the Minister of Finance brought down the budget. My question to the Leader of the Government is this: Is the government prepared to take extraordinary steps to restore confidence in our currency?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I support the Minister of Finance in his assessment of the situation, that the budget will restore confidence in the Canadian dollar. It is clear that it has not done so to date, and my honourable friend is quite right on that. It indicates that there is a considerable task ahead of the financial community and of the government itself to ensure that the meaning of the budget, the facts of the budget and its implications are disseminated as widely as possible in order to help deal with this question.

I do not think it would be proper for me to say whether the government or the Bank of Canada intends to take any extraordinary measures, because that has to be done by those concerned at the time with respect to financial markets. I do not think it would be useful for me to speculate on that subject.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, in light of the statement made by the Leader of the Government, I wonder, if there are not to be extraordinary steps, whether there will be any unusual steps taken by members of the government to assist in bringing about greater understanding in a situation that seems to have left many financial people wondering what the minister was really saying.

Senator Roblin: I do not know that it is unusual. In fact, it is not unusual, but we are certainly giving more attention these days to spreading the good word. I believe that ministers of the Crown and members of the Department of Finance are scheduling meetings with various parties in the financial realm in many places, not only in Canada, but in the United States, and, indeed, throughout the world. They are seeking opportunities for discussion with those parties on the present economic status of the country and the impact of the budget. I hope that as a result of that there will be a wider understanding of the government's intentions.

• (1500)

Senator Sinclair: Can the Leader of the Government assist the chamber by advising whether there is an opportunity for all members of the House of Commons and the Senate to leave Ottawa to spread the good word, by prorogation or adjournment of Parliament, to enable this matter to be dealt with expeditiously?

Senator Frith: To enable the gospel to be disseminated.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am almost tempted to believe that I have received an offer of assistance from my honourable friend. If that is so, I accept it, and I tell him that his good word and support in financial circles in Montreal and Toronto, to go no further, would certainly be a considerable contribution toward restoring confidence in the Canadian dollar.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I would love to do that if I had the necessary facts to proceed in that way, but I have not. As honourable senators know, the vice president of the Chicago monetary authority has stated that there is general disappointment with the budget. The minister has said that some businessmen support him, but he has not named who they are. I looked at the BCNI statement, which was pretty wishy-washy. Perhaps what is required is a task force made up of everyone. If the facts do not support that confidence, then the government will know and can take appropriate action. I would ask whether that is going to be done.

Senator Roblin: I guess that we are verging on a debate. That would be my assessment of the situation. I will simply conclude my part of it by saying that I will see that my honourable friend has a complete set of budget papers, by means of which he can form his own conclusions.

Senator Frith: That is what he is worried about.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I follow up the questions asked by Senator Sinclair by referring to the Leader of the Government's acknowledgement that the budget has not restored confidence in the Canadian dollar and that what is required is a better understanding of the contents of the budget—that that is the obstacle.

Last week the Minister of Finance, when asked in the House of Commons, said it would not be possible for the international community to assess the budget so quickly, because they had to read the budget papers and examine all of these matters in detail. It is now five days since the budget. Does the Leader of the Government have that in mind as the reason why an understanding has not been possible for the international community?

Senator Roblin: I really have no means of reading the minds of the international community. I cannot pretend to know what particular problems they perceive. But I think it would be advantageous, in any case, to let them know our point of view, and to give them as much detail as they require, in order that they may see the basis on which our judgments are formed. One must hope that that will strike a responsive chord with respect to them.

How long these matters take to work through is anyone's guess. It depends which financial expertise you read. I saw one yesterday that said it took two weeks for the information to filter through. I have no means of knowing whether or not that is the case. All I know is that we have to go on presenting our case in order to see that the Canadian dollar receives the support it deserves.

Senator MacEachen: I did not have in mind what the international financial community was bothered about. I had in mind the statement of the Minister of Finance, who said that the reason was lack of knowledge in the financial community, that they had to read in order to understand. Since the Leader of the Government has repeated the same point, I now ask whether the government proposes to take any particular action internationally in order to ensure that the good points—which up to the present have escaped the international financiers—are brought to their attention? Is there any program internationally to ensure that the good points are brought home to those who are now treating the Canadian dollar so roughly?

Senator Roblin: I believe that is the case.

Senator MacEachen: That is interesting. What is the program that is being undertaken?

Senator Roblin: In reply to one of the questions asked by Senator Sinclair, I pointed out that there was an effort being made by members of the government and by members of the Department of Finance to get in touch with influential people in the financial community who deal with foreign exchange and other matters, in order to develop the very points to which my honourable friend is referring.

Senator MacEachen: In the meantime, is the government or the Bank of Canada taking any action to support the Canadian dollar at the present time? Is it a fact, as is now commonly alleged, that the government found it necessary to enter the foreign exchange market yesterday and today in order to shore up the value of the Canadian dollar?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I will make an inquiry and if the information can be given out, I will provide it for my honourable friend.

THE BUDGET

FARM CREDIT LOAN PROVISIONS—IMPACT ON FARMERS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I wish to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Can he tell us how the 6 per cent rate for a Farm Credit mortgage loan will work for a mortgagee who has a substantial loan and who qualifies by having equity of under 40 per cent? Can he give us any information on what will be done about the total obligation that the farmer has to the Farm Credit Corporation?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I expect that quite shortly the Minister of Agriculture will be making a full statement on how this scheme will work. When that information is available, I will provide it for my honourable friend.

Senator Argue: I can appreciate that. Does the Leader of the Government know whether or not there is any adjustment downward of the total amount owing by any individual farmer to the Farm Credit Corporation? Is there an element of debt reduction, or is there just a rescheduling of the total amount at a lower rate of interest, and the extra amount will be paid at a later date? It is a simple question, and I do not know the answer.

Senator Roblin: I do not intend to scoop my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture. He will make the statement, not me.

Senator Argue: I am rather disappointed that that assurance cannot be given. I will say—and I suppose the record can be seen by the Minister of Agriculture—that if what they are doing is reducing the rate that a farmer has to pay in a given year, only to have it paid at a later date, and in the meantime index it to the commodities, then all the government is doing in an official way is postponing temporarily the number of farmers going under. I thought this was a rescue operation, but it looks to me as though a lot of it is just plain window dressing.

Senator Roblin: When the statement is made, my honourable friend can favour us with opinions on the matter. I do not agree with his observation that it is window dressing.

Senator Argue: I hope that you are right and that I am wrong.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ROLE IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on the occasion of International Women's Week and the tabling earlier today in the other place of the document "Toward Equality" by the Minister of Justice, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government to explain the government's decision to deny the opportunity for women seeking a fighting role in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when the statement is discussed in the other house, I believe further comment will be made with respect to that. I would ask my honourable friend to wait until that statement is made, and I can then furnish him with a copy.

Senator Haidasz: As a supplementary, in connection with the minister's statement that mandatory retirement is not now an absolute rule in Canada, I should like to ask how the change affects the members of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: Thank God the Senate is the exception that proves the rule.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if he can help some of those people who are vitally and even desperately concerned about what is going to happen to the oil and gas industry in Canada.

● (1510)

He will know that I have asked a series of questions over the past several weeks about this. To date, there has been a small amount of information given, but normally we have been told that there is a watching brief until some later day when the government considers it more appropriate to take some action with respect to this matter.

That is the answer I received when the oil price was $24 a barrel; it is the answer I received when the oil price was $20 a barrel, $18 a barrel, $15 a barrel, and now it is down to somewhere between $12 and $13 a barrel on the most immediate month's futures, so I wonder if we can be given some information today as to what action the government is considering, if any.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I cannot give my honourable friend satisfaction with respect to his question. It would be, of course, quite out of order for me to try to indicate what the government might be considering. I can only advise when a matter of policy has been decided. That is when I can give the facts to my friend, but no policy change has been decided, so there is no further information I can give him.

Senator Olson: As a supplementary, honourable senators, there are some people whose whole economic base—whether you want to call it a job, or some other term to describe the means by which they receive their income—is eroding so rapidly that it is very difficult for them to see whether or not they are going to make it for a few more weeks, never mind any further into the future than that.

Without being specific, I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us whether or not the government intends to help this important sector of our economy, as governments have helped other sectors of the economy in the past, whether that was the agricultural industry, the fisheries industry, the automotive industry, or whatever.

Senator Roblin: I am sure that every government wishes to be thought of as being helpful in dealing with any industrial problem. I can tell my honourable friend that until a policy change has been made, I am unable to provide further information.

Senator Olson: I can understand that, but I wonder whether it is the position of the government that it is going to wait with the watching brief, or take so long that this industry will become so weak that there will be no chance of its recovering in its present form.

I ask that question because I agree with the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Energy and Natural Resources for Alberta when they said at a meeting held approximately ten days ago that the industry will survive. There is no doubt that the pipelines and wells are not going to disappear. But survive in what form? Can the people now involved in this industry look to it as the base of their economic well-being again? Or, is the government going to wait until it is so weak that there is no chance of its recovering for the benefit of those Canadian citizens who are now involved in it?

Senator Roblin: I very much hope that this gloomy projection does not come to pass, but I have nothing to add to my previous statement.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, can the government give us some indication as to when that might happen? Is it a matter of another two weeks, or another $5 decline in the price of a barrel of oil, or what is it that is going to bring this government around to realizing that it needs to face up to its responsibility in this matter and indicate that it is prepared to do what federal governments of Canada have done in the past, and that is take their responsibility seriously?

Senator Roblin: I am really not disposed to take my honourable friend's advice, because I remember well that he was the minister in charge of a most important economic portfolio in the previous government when the question of support of or government interference with the oil industry was on the table.

I do not think that the remedies recommended at that time were sufficiently impressive to suggest that his advice should be followed today with respect to that industry.

If he is going to ask me the same question, I tell him again that I am unable to announce policy at the present time. That is the only statement I can make.

Senator Olson: It is not a question of whether or not the remedies that he now rejects—and I think he rejected them some time ago—are appropriate or not. Am I to take it from the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the choice, as far as he and this government can see, is to do what the previous government did, or do nothing? Is that the limit of the ingenuity and imagination of this government?

Senator Roblin: It was not just myself who rejected those remedies. The Senate itself rejected those in its own committee, as my honourable friend knows very well. So, there should be common ground for us in respect of that matter.

In spite of my honourable friend's needling, I am not going to respond in the way he would like me to. I will be my usual informative self and tell him that when I have something that I can tell him, I will, but until I have something to tell him, then I have to decline to answer his questions.

Senator Olson: There is a large number of people in this country who are reaching the end of their rope, and they rely on their elected representatives and others, such as the members of the Senate, to at least take their responsibility seriously enough to acknowledge that there is a problem that requires the attention of the government. So far the leader has left them—because they make inquiries of me to try to find out what the government is doing—with the impression that the government is not going to do anything.

Is that what I can report back again this week?

Senator Roblin: Wait and see.

Senator Frith: That's the answer.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I think Senator Olson has painted very well the difficult position of the oil industry. We can bleed for them and we can cry for them! Undoubtedly, some of the independents are in serious difficulty. I think it is terrible for the people of Canada because parts of the oil industry may be going broke and the consumer is paying virtually the same price even though there has been a collapse of world oil prices.

My question is rather simple, and I hope not naive, and is: When might we expect some drop in gasoline prices at the pumps? It has gone down 2 cents a litre, but it looks as though the international price of oil has dropped by $15 a barrel and the consumer is lucky to get a $2 or $3 drop per barrel on a fill up at the pumps. When will the next move to lower prices be made by Exxon, Shell, and Petro-Canada?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will find that, as the cheaper oil hits the refineries and gets into the distribution system, there will be further reductions in the price of gasoline.

Senator Argue: From what I have been reading, the time has come for that, and it is getting through the system. I remember when it went the other way; it took about five minutes to get through the system.

I was in Florida a few weeks ago—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Argue: Well, many people go to Florida. I went on very little; I drove my old Chev. My wife and I were coming back about three weeks ago and we pulled into an Exxon station, one of the big ones—it was the only credit card I had or I would have gone to another one—and there were four or five cars lined up at the pumps. They were waiting. I asked what the delay was about. The people who were lined up told me that the attendants were putting down the price of gasoline at the pumps. They had just gone down on the international market three days earlier, and now the attendants were putting the prices down at the pumps. They lowered the price to 89 cents for an American gallon, which is cheap gas, even when one takes into consideration the smaller U.S. gallon and the exchange rate.

My question is: If Exxon can put it down in the United States in 72 hours, why can they not do the same thing in Canada, or does it take longer to get through the pipeline in Canada than it does in the United States?

The consumer in Canada is being screwed by the oil companies, and it is a shame because that is not what is happening in the United States.

[Senator Olson.]

Senator Roblin: I do not care very much for being placed in the position of defending the oil companies for their handling of the price of gasoline—

Senator Frith: It goes with the territory—

• (1520)

Senator Roblin: —because I have to admit that my friend's arguments find a sympathetic ear over here. However, as we all know, when the interest rates change, the banks are not too swift to raise the rates they pay their depositors, but they are certainly pretty swift to raise the rates they charge to borrowers. If that is a libel on the banking system, it is certainly a widely-held view, and I must say that, so far, I share it. I might be convinced otherwise.

I cannot appear to defend the activities of the oil companies here, but I think there is a reasonable explanation which my friend might wish to examine, and that is that it is a question of contract. If you are able to buy spot oil at these reducing prices, then you can, quite properly, bring your price down to reflect that spot price. If you are dealing in a matter of contract where prices were set some time ago, and that contract still holds good and that costly oil is still flowing through, that is another question.

However, I am not telling my honourable friend that that is the reason because I do not know, but I am telling him that that is the best explanation I can offer him at the moment.

Senator Argue: That is a speculative explanation and it does not carry the weight of the government. In fact, I think it is the minister's own personal explanation. What I cannot understand is why every filling station and every company in the United States has access to a spot price while, at the same time, no one in Canada, apparently, has access to a spot price. Why are we hamstrung by contracts that are consistent for everyone—this seems to be the tenor of the answer, although I doubt it very much—while in the United States they do not have that kind of a system? Could the reason be that American law says there shall be competition and, in Canada, this government, with the agencies it has out there, is condoning a monopoly system that is gouging the consumer, even when some producers are suffering because of the collapse in international prices? You cannot have it both ways.

Senator Roblin: No, you cannot, but when you have a spot price system in the United States, when the prices are going up, the reverse happens. I heard nothing from my honourable friend when that happened. However, I will say to my honourable friend—

Senator Argue: I did not like the prices going up overnight and the oil companies gouging me on their inventory. I never liked that.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to know that that is the case. However, I want to tell my honourable friend that the system we have in Canada with respect to the oil industry is not something that was developed overnight. The system we have in this country has been the operative system for many a long year.

Senator Olson: It is not. Not in the way it is being administered now.

Senator Roblin: I am talking about the question of competition, monopoly and things of that sort. That is what I am talking about. I am not talking about other aspects of the matter which may be the concern of my friend.

However, I must tell the house that, in speaking for the government, I have no information that can throw on this situation the light that my honourable friend seeks. All I can tell him is that, at the present time, it is our policy to let the economic forces take their course. We have some confidence in thinking that that will result in a reduction in prices before long.

Senator Argue: I think that is an abdication of the government's responsibility. I am rather simple minded; I think that when there is a collapse of the oil prices, there should be some action taken by the government to see that those lower prices flow through the system. Obviously, there is no action; the minister says that there is nothing new. To me, it is very new to have a drop in price from a high of $31 a barrel last fall to a low of under $13 per barrel today. If the price went down to zero, do you think we would get any benefit from that? Apparently not, since with two thirds of the price gone, we have gained a reduction of two cents. Perhaps we could look forward to another cent reduction under this trickle-down theory. Perhaps because of the cold weather, the oil does not get through those pipelines we have heard so much about. I think the whole thing is a scandal.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could tell us what the government intends to do. He has been trying to explain what the companies ought to do and the reasons for their actions in terms of getting rid of the inventory and so on. Does the government intend to take any action with respect to this problem?

Senator Roblin: I think I should make it quite clear to my honourable friend that one of the principles which guide this government in its policy is that it is not interventionary into the economic system where it does not need to be.

Senator Olson: Then you are abdicating your responsibility.

Senator Roblin: No, we are not.

Senator Frith: Laissez faire; good old Tory laissez faire.

Senator Roblin: It is not laissez faire either. It is a judicious application of the market principle insofar as that is possible to support. If we find a case where we do not think it is possible to support the market in any particular matter, we will intervene, but we do not think it is necessary for us to intervene in either of the instances we have been discussing.

Senator Olson: The market that is out there now is as a result of some political decisions such as those made by Sheik Yamani and others. Is it the government's position that we must live by that, rather than by what we do in Canada?

Senator Roblin: It will be interesting to see what Sheik Yamani does. He will get the world price down to $10 per barrel, if he has his way.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On November 26, 1985, I put a written question on the order paper seeking some statistical information that ought not to be too difficult to compile.

Because of persisting rumours that Parliament will prorogue and that, therefore, questions on the order paper may die, I wonder if perhaps the Leader of the Government would intercede on my behalf and have this information conveyed to me.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If the question is on the order paper, it is not generally handled by me; it is handled by the Clerk of the Senate, and I am sure he has taken note of my friend's observation.

BANKING

PROMOTION OF INTERNATIONAL BANKING CENTRES

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, perhaps the Leader of the Government could inform the Senate why the government and the Minister of Finance, in his Budget address, chose to deny the representations of the Mayor of Toronto and the Province of Ontario to allow Metro Toronto to become an international banking centre, while, at the same time, granting the representations of the City of Montreal and the Province of Quebec that will allow Montreal to become an international banking centre through the use of discriminatory tax measures.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am not sure that the Minister of Finance is guilty of the charges laid by my honourable friend. In fact, I would hazard a guess that he is not. However, I will take my honourable friend's question as notice.

Senator Grafstein: If my premise proves to be correct, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise the minister that this is a very dangerous precedent in what could be a series of government policies that would discriminate between cities and thereby trigger a very costly tax incentive war between the various cities and provinces in this country? I say to my honourable friend that this is a very dangerous precedent and I hope that the Leader of the Government in the Senate, aided by his colleagues from cities across the country, will ask the Minister of Finance to change his mind on this very important and dangerous precedent.

Senator Frith: But this government is not interventionist. They are going to let the market forces play.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that the fear my honourable friend raises will prove to be substantial.

Senator Grafstein: While the Leader of the Government in the Senate is seeking the information I ask, perhaps he could also find out on behalf of the Senate and the people of Canada what this tax measure will cost citizens across the country.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will find that information in the tax papers. The amount is not considered to be large.

EXPO 86

ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As next door neighbours, we Yukoners feel very close to British Columbia and I hope the senators from that province will not object to an outsider making a pitch on behalf of Expo 86.

I have recently had the pleasure of visiting the Canada Pavillion and the Expo 86 site and it is absolutely magnificent. British Columbia has done a remarkable job of putting Expo 86 together and I am sure it will be a world-class event that will make all Canadians very proud. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate could do something to make senators and others more aware of what is going on in order to help make it a priority for senators and all members of Parliament, with their families, to visit Vancouver this summer and participate in this event.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure that we are all glad to hear my honourable friend's intervention, because this is a national project; it is not a provincial one. It belongs to all Canadians and I am among those who hope to visit it. However, I think the Government of British Columbia has already distributed—to me, at any rate—a pretty substantial brochure giving the full story of the exhibition in Vancouver. I thought this brochure was an attractive and entertaining piece of work and I think senators ought to inform themselves about this event.

● (1530)

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, if I may, I will add some information on that point. There is under consideration the possibility of establishing a special two or three day itinerary for those members of Parliament from the Senate or the House of Commons to visit Expo, perhaps some time in May. This is a multipartisan project involving those members who serve in Parliament from British Columbia. It is non-partisan, multipartisan—

Senator Frith: Megapartisan? Can I go?

Senator Perrault: As Senator Lucier has so eloquently and generously stated, this will be quite a world's fair. The fair has already sold in excess of seven million visits, which is a new record for world fairs anywhere—money in the bank. It will be an extremely successful enterprise and a tribute to all parts of Canada, since all of the provinces are participating.

Senator Roblin: Manitoba isn't.

Senator Perrault: Unfortunately—

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Roblin: "Unfortunately" is right.

Senator Perrault: Unfortunately that is so, and I agree with the Leader of the Government on that point. If there is interest in the idea of a special three-day itinerary for parliamentarians, I can only say that members of the various parties are enthusiastic about putting that plan into effect.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—1983 STABILIZATION PAYMENT—1986 CROP YEAR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I should like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I ask this question in the absence of our colleague, Senator Fairbairn, so he can guess what the subject matter is going to be. He also knows that it affects the province of Manitoba.

Could the Leader of the Government advise us whether any decision has been taken by the government with regard to the sugar-beet industry? Will there be an announcement from the government on the stabilization payment that is due from back in 1983? What is the policy for the coming year?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that my colleague, the Minister of State, has been in touch with leaders in that industry over the last day or two. I will inquire from him as to when he will be able to make a definitive statement on this matter.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, the specific reason for the question is that, on February 18, when Senator Fairbairn asked the question, she indicated that there was a group of sugar-beet growers which intended to come to Ottawa on or about March 3. The government leader at that time replied:

I can tell the honourable senator, though, that I have every expectation that any demonstration on or about March 3 would be unnecessary.

It is now March 4, and it is my understanding that some of these growers are either on the way to Ottawa or certainly intend to be here this very week.

Honourable senators, we keep on getting this postponement. My honourable friend knows very well the cost to these farmers to come to Ottawa in order to put this pressure on. Surely we do not have to put them to this exercise every year.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am aware of the exchange that took place on February 18. I looked it up because I thought that this matter would likely be raised today. What I said was:

It is a gratuitous exercise to predict when cabinet is finally going to deal with a matter, as those who have served in cabinets would agree. I am a little reluctant to accept my honourable friend's invitation to give a date.

So I did not give a date. I did say, however, that my expectation was that any demonstration in Ottawa on March 3—and I now add at any time—would not be necessary because I am still optimistic in respect of this matter. I know that my colleague, the Minister of State, has met with the sugar-beet people—sometimes in the provinces, not always in Ottawa—and that he has been meeting with them already this week. The best I can do is to say that, as soon as the final decision is made, I will announce it. I think I am going to adopt a self-denying ordinance not even to hint as to when I think the decision might be made, because obviously my record in that respect is not what my honourable friend would hope.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Does the Leader of the Government expect that there will be a sugar-beet crop seeded in 1986?

Senator Roblin: As I have already stated, my colleague is discussing the question of the future of the sugar-beet industry with those concerned. I do not think that I should make any statement at this time because I expect that he will be making one shortly.

Senator Olson: Does the government leader have any idea whether government policy will support the seeding of a crop? That is what I am asking him. I understand that he cannot provide all of the details, but my question is: Are we going to have a crop or have we now reached the stage where this government has written the sugar-beet industry off?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will just have to possess his soul in patience. As soon as I have an answer to his question, I will give it to him.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON HERBICIDE PRICING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, entitled "Herbicide Pricing".

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators are aware that, on behalf of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, I tabled, on February 13, the fourth report of that committee respecting herbicide pricing. I rise to say a few words about that report and to give honourable senators the opportunity to respond to it.

I should first like to pay tribute to the members of the committee, particularly those members who are more inclined towards issues concerning agriculture, for persevering at the committee meetings while we were dealing with the study on the marketing of fish and, at the same time, sporadically tried to deal with the herbicide pricing report which arose out of the earlier committee report entitled "Soil at Risk". Even though they were, predominantly, members of the opposition, I want to thank them for bearing with the committee and its deliberations in such a way as to enable it to reach its conclusions and finish its report on "Soil at Risk".

In that report, honourable senators, the committee concluded that excessive tillage is a major cause of soil degradation. It also concluded that, because of high costs and low market returns, many farmers cannot afford to implement what they recognize as needed conservation practices. Switching to reduced tillage requires greater amounts of herbicides to produce cash generating crops that can make the difference between financial survival and bankruptcy for many farmers. It was recognized by the committee that greater herbicide use entails higher costs, which constitute a restraint to widespread adoption of this conservation practice. It was also recognized that an additional restraint to the adoption of reduced tillage is the belief of farmers that herbicides are overpriced.

After hearing many witnesses from farm groups, chemical companies and the government, the committee concluded that registration of herbicides as it is now enforced is no longer acceptable. The cost of testing products for registration has become onerous, leaving the way open only to very large companies to be able to afford them. The committee believes that altering product-specific registration and increasing competition in the farm chemical industry by opening the way to smaller companies, through the introduction of compulsory licensing and a system of royalties, can, in the end, help to reduce costs to the farmer.

The committee also examined evidence and concluded that there is a need for the Department of Agriculture to give a mandate to and to allocate sufficient resources to the Inputs and Technology Division of that department for the purpose of maintaining a permanent and on-going record of farm chemical prices in Canada and to examine, on an on-going basis, the implications of farm chemical regulations, registration and pricing for the farm population and the industry.

Finally, it is hoped that the recommendations in the report—which is evidently receiving positive response across the country—will be implemented for the benefit of farmers and the industry.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Molgat, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.45 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—MEETING BETWEEN PRODUCERS AND GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate respecting a matter Senator Fairbairn has brought up a number of times—that being whether or not, when, if ever, the government is going to make an announcement respecting sugar-beet policy. I understand that there was a meeting between representatives of the Canadian sugar-beet producers and the government, including the Leader of the Government. I wonder if he could inform the Senate as to what, in fact, he advised those representatives.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend is correct. I was pleased to meet with a delegation of representatives of the sugar-beet industry from the three provinces affected, Alberta, Manitoba and Quebec. They gave me some very good insights into the problems that they are facing. For my part, I undertook to do my best to get answers to their questions as soon as I could. I have to tell my honourable friend, however, that I am not in a position to make any further statement this afternoon.

Senator Olson: Did the delegation impress upon the Leader of the Government the urgent nature of timing in this matter because of certain preparations which have to be made—such as the use of herbicides and other things required for producing a crop in 1986—and the fact that some time has already been lost?

Senator Roblin: The delegation gave me a very full report on many aspects of their industry. I shall do my best to take all those matters into account.

Senator Olson: Did the Leader of the Government give some indication as to when the delegation would receive a response that would allow them to initiate the process so that they could plan for a crop in 1986?

Senator Roblin: I would not dare to give them a date like that when I would not give it to my honourable friend.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I was about to get around to that, but I have to tell the Leader of the Government that while he may be able to do a lot of things, he cannot stop the clock. Today is March 5, tomorrow will be March 6 and so on. Sugar-beets, after being seeded in the spring, have a habit of growing in the summertime and being harvested in the fall. Can the Leader of the Government indicate whether the government is attempting to change this process, or is it going to accommodate itself to the seasons?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I cannot stop the clock and, obviously, I cannot stop my honourable friend either.

Senator Argue: And you cannot start the government!

Senator Olson: Nor are you like King Canute who ordered the tide not to come in.

Senator Roblin: My name is not Canute.

PRIVACY

REPORTED GIVING OF INFORMATION RE UNEMPLOYED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government would confirm for me whether or not it is true that the names, telephone numbers and addresses of all unemployed people were given out to a private firm in this country last year?

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I noticed the same press report that my friend is referring to, and I have asked for inquiries to be made to ascertain the facts of the matter.

Senator Bonnell: I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would take a suggestion back to the powers that be to tell them that if they have made that mistake they should never do it again.

Senator Roblin: First of all, I must find out what the facts are. After that, I will consider my friend's suggestion.

TRANSPORT

CN MARINE—INCREASE IN FERRY RATES

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have another question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate, concerning Atlantic Canada. In that region we have ferries operated by CN Marine. A short time ago I asked a question concerning the fact that the ferries between Wood Island and Caribou would not start running until May 1. Since then, we have had an announcement that the ferry rates on CN Marine were to be increased by 6 per cent.

I would like to ask my honourable friend if it is not true that, when Prince Edward Island joined Confederation, there was a promise of a continuous link with the mainland. However, with this increase in rates or fares, it seems that now we must pay to visit another province, or charge people who want to come to Prince Edward Island. This hardly seems fair when Canadians can travel all the way from British Columbia through the prairie provinces, Ontario and out to the east coast without having to pay for the simple fact of leaving one province and entering another, but if I want to go visit my friend the deputy leader in Newfoundland, I must pay, and if he wants to come visit me in Prince Edward Island, he must pay.

Now that the fare has been increased by 6 per cent, I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to make representations to the Treasury Board to have these ferry trips provided free to Canadians to enable them to travel from one province to another without having to pay for crossing an interprovincial boundary.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am afraid I cannot accept that suggestion.

PROPOSED TUNNEL OR CAUSEWAY BETWEEN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND AND MAINLAND

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have one further question for the Leader of the Government. From his last answer, I understand that he considers it worth a great deal to come to Prince Edward Island. I also understand that, in order to make the culture of Prince Edward Island more readily available to outsiders, the government is considering joining the rest of the nation to that province by means of a tunnel or causeway. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me whether the government has that project on its agenda for the near future?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My problem is that if I say yes to that question, my colleague from Newfoundland will wonder what I intend to do for him. However, he is a little too far away to be accommodated in that manner.

I suggest to my honourable friend that both of us must get behind the Honourable the Minister of the Environment and give a little push.

Senator Bonnell: Do I understand from the answer that the honourable leader has given that a tunnel or causeway to Prince Edward Island is not in the planning stage by cabinet at the present time?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows that I cannot discuss what takes place in cabinet.

Senator Argue: But did it take place?

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have one further question relating to Atlantic Canada. At the present time in our country, agriculture is in a real crisis. I understand that the agricultural situation is fairly serious in the west, but in the east, where we depend so much on our potato, the price of potatoes now is down to approximately $1.50 for a hundred pound bag. In fact, we are starting to bury them in the ground and the Province of Prince Edward Island is paying two cents per pound for them.

We in the Atlantic provinces are hoping that the federal Minister of Agriculture will offer to assist this very important industry in the provinces of New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and perhaps even Newfoundland.

I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there is a government policy that we can expect very soon to assist the potato industry, and agriculture in general, in eastern Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will ask my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, what satisfaction he can give my friend.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

YUKON ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM—DELAY IN IMPLEMENTATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure he has seen this full-page advertisement that appeared in most of the papers in Canada concerning the Yukon Indian Development Corporation. This is a funding program for native economic development and is very important, not only to the Indians of the Yukon but to native people all across Canada. We cannot discuss Indian self-government seriously when we are continuing to deny them the opportunity to get involved in programs that will lead them to that end.

I would like to know if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would consider making representations to the Prime Minister on behalf of the Indian people of the Yukon who are making this particular application, in an attempt to expedite this matter. These people have been waiting for 18 months for something that everyone is in favour of. Indeed, not only is everyone in favour of this development fund but their application has been called a model and they have received not one negative comment.

I wonder if the leader would, on behalf of the Indian people of the Yukon—because I know he has some feeling for them—take this matter before the cabinet and try to expedite it for them.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that during the past few months the department in charge of this particular activity has approved a number of projects totalling over some $30 million and providing some 2,000 jobs. So, the officials are not exactly asleep at the switch with respect to this matter.

On the other hand, I understand the concern of my friend as to the particular project in question, and I will make inquiries to see what the status of that project is at the moment.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DISCRIMINATORY HIRING PRACTICES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, the adoption by Parliament a few years ago of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms marked a significant advance in the attempt by the government, together with Canadians, to end discrimination based on age, racial descent, religion, and a number of other criteria. The Minister of Justice tabled a potentially significant document on that subject yesterday.

I received a telephone call yesterday from a 26-year-old man from British Columbia who said he had been at an Armed Forces recruiting office yesterday afternoon and was told: "We are not actively encouraging recruitment of those above the age of 25."

That telephone call distressed me because I had hoped that when we talked about human rights, and extending the rights of individuals, regardless of age, that we would not have government departments in the field not observing the spirit and letter of the law. I should like to know what I can tell that young man today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): First of all, I will have to ascertain the facts. If my honourable friend will give me the name of the person, the time and date of the incident, and all other facts that are available, I will make an inquiry into the matter for him.

AGRICULTURE

FARM DEBT REVIEW—ROLE OF PANELS

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. As the leader will know, approximately 75 per cent of the farm debt is held outside of the Farm Credit Corporation. The Minister of Finance, in his Budget speech, stated:

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will introduce legislation to establish Farm Debt Review Panels to provide advice and assistance in restructuring farmers' debt.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate what kind of assistance will be provided. Is the government considering providing financial assistance, or simply advice? This information may already be in the public domain, but if it is I have not seen it.

Will these panels give advice only, or will they have some financial resources so that they can assist deserving cases?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I cannot answer the question at the present time because it depends on the content of the legislation. The legislation will be tabled shortly, and my friend's questions will be covered in that respect.

Senator Argue: I would think that that question could be answered now. I would think that that is something that has already been discussed.

Can the leader give us any idea whether or not these panels will have any power? He has not been able to say whether they will have any money, so will they just have moral or persuasive powers? Will there be any power given to these panels at all?

I ask this because the situation is very serious. The banks are on a crusade to foreclose on many, many farms. They are forcing farmers into bankruptcy. The banks are taking an unconscionable attitude, and I hope that these panels will be given some authority.

Will these panels have authority, or will they just have persuasive powers with no clout or legal authority?

Senator Roblin: The actions of those who might be pressing farmers unduly for repayment will be the sort of thing that these panels will deal with.

As to their composition, their powers, their authority, and their functions in more detail, for that information we must wait for the tabling of the legislation.

Senator Argue: The leader has said that they will have some authority, so perhaps they can persuade banks to withdraw their foreclosure actions, or perhaps they will be able to slow the banks down. I do not have much faith in that kind of power because the banks are on a campaign to take over farms; there is just no doubt about that. The provincial authorities in my province have given no power to the review boards; they merely bring them in and talk to them. My experience is that, in fact, the end result of their being there is, at times, to facilitate foreclosures and not to slow them down.

In any event, can the Leader of the Government tell us when we may expect legislation; before the sugar-beet announcement or after; or is it going to be fairly soon?

Senator Roblin: I want to tell my honourable friend that this new body will not be designed to facilitate foreclosures by the banks. That is, of course, an opinion which I think is completely unfounded, and I do not give it any credence whatsoever.

As to the timing of the legislation, when I am able to give my honourable friend a statement on that, I will do so.

Senator Argue: Is the minister saying that there is no credence to my statement regarding Saskatchewan?

Senator Roblin: No, I did not say that.

Senator Argue: I was not referring to this proposed board. I was asking whether or not it was going to be in that position. If the minister says that it will not be doing that, I accept his opinion and I am pleased with that, but, from what I have seen of the operation in Saskatchewan, we need a federal board with some authority because there is no body that exercises any authority in Saskatchewan to slow down the banks.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will have to wait until I am able to show him the legislation and, if he finds it defective, then I am sure I will hear from him.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

POLL—AWARDING OF CONTRACT

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate will agree that I am a very reasonable and patient man.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, yes; hear, hear.

Senator Frith: At least.

Senator Davey: I asked a question on November 5, 1985, and on December 3, 1985, which has not been answered. I am going to try again.

I wonder if the leader could update me on the status of the Department of Supply and Services omnibus public opinion poll for which tenders have been in place since the end of August 1985. That is now my third try with this question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my honourable friend's question presupposes that the Department of Supply and Services or the government has a policy in respect of this matter of which I am not aware. I do not think there is any omnibus poll policy in effect at the present time.

Senator Davey: My apologies; I did not hear the response. I wonder if the leader would mind repeating his answer.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is implying that there is an omnibus public opinion machine in effect in the government service at the present time.

Senator Davey: I am sure the Leader of the Government would know if one were about to be put in place, because there has been a great deal of discussion about it, and that is why I asked the question.

Senator Roblin: There is no such policy at the present time.

Senator Davey: I have a supplementary question concerning an article by a most distinguished journalist, Mr. Hugh Winsor, writing in the Globe and Mail on January 16, 1986.

Senator Marshall: Distinguished?

Senator Davey: I think so.

Senator Frith: Reasonable and patient also.

Senator Davey: He says that the proposal has been placed on the back burner because the cabinet fears it could backfire politically. Is that an accurate assessment of the situation?

Senator Roblin: I do not, as a rule, accept it as part of my responsibility to comment on what journalists say. They are entitled to their opinions, and I respect their opinions, but I do not necessarily have to comment on them or agree with them.

Senator Davey: Even if it is a distinguished journalist?

Senator Roblin: Even with as distinguished a person as my honourable friend.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

RECRUITING PRACTICES OF RCMP

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I should like to pose a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

It is my understanding that the RCMP is recruiting personnel to perform guard duties at embassies and that some of the applicants are being told that only applications from people who are fluently bilingual will be entertained. To my mind, this is rather unfair, because an individual who is unilingual

French or unilingual English certainly will not have an opportunity to qualify for one of those positions.

I do not expect the minister to carry all this information around in his head, as brilliant as he is—and I mean that sincerely. Would he try to find out for me whether there is a school where, if the applicant qualified in every other way, he could be taught English or French in order to be admitted to the RCMP?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know the facts of the matter and I will be glad to answer my honourable friend's question if I am able to. However, I would not be surprised if a bilingual qualification were necessary for guards at embassies, in view of the bilingual character of the country and having regard to the nature of the traffic into those buildings. I will, however, try to get more information about the school that is the subject of my friend's inquiry.

Senator Muir: I fully agree with what the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said.

Senator Guay: You should.

Senator Muir: But I still think it is not fair to other citizens of Canada who have not had the opportunity to become fluent in both official languages. Those who can speak only English are disqualified from receiving consideration for recruitment to the RCMP as are those who can speak only French. With all of our language training courses and so on, should people who are otherwise suitable not be given an opportunity to enrol in these schools and thus make themselves eligible? I shall be happy to provide some information on this matter to the Leader of the Government, if he so wishes.

Senator Roblin: I think that I should stick to my original answer and see what information I can get.

FILM INDUSTRY

IDENTIFICATION OF CANADIAN PRODUCTION LOCALES

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I should like to raise a question relating to the Canadian film production industry. That industry has made enormous strides in recent years. Canadian production units, processing laboratories, writers, actors and producers have achieved world-wide eminence, yet they deserve even more credit than they are given in certain circles. For example, the Canadian film industry is often compared unfairly and unfavourably with the Australian film industry. One of the reasons may well be because Australian productions are identifiably Australian; they are clearly filmed in Australia. In my following remarks, I do not mean to indict the present government alone because the problem which I am referring to has existed for some time.

Over the past 15 years, many millions of dollars have been expended and a number of incentives have been put in place by the federal and provincial governments to encourage the development of a Canadian film industry as well as to attract more foreign film companies to Canadian production sites. Film production is now a big industry in Canada. Among the alleged benefits flowing from this taxpayer largesse towards the motion picture industry is supposed to be favourable publicity for the Canadian tourism industry.

Will the Leader of the Government tell us precisely how Canadian tourism is being assisted when, almost without exception, Canadian film locales are identified as American? Canadian signs and symbols are changed whenever the production units are moved into Alberta, British Columbia or Ontario. Banff and Jasper suddenly become Denver, Colorado; Vancouver becomes Los Angeles; Vancouver's Chinatown becomes San Francisco; Toronto blossoms forth as New York—far cleaner than the original product!—Winnipeg becomes Chicago or Minneapolis; Saskatchewan becomes Kansas or Iowa; Montreal becomes New Orleans and the Atlantic provinces are transformed miraculously into New England. There is no RCMP—indeed, it is alleged that one production unit in British Columbia borrowed RCMP equipment and insisted that the name “RCMP” be painted off the search and rescue helicopter and that the name “L.A. Police” be stamped on in its place.

Some Canadians are getting fed up with the almost total unwillingness of visiting film production units to identify Canadian locales as Canadian and thereby keep from their viewing audiences the fact that some of the greatest scenery on the face of this earth is to be found in Canada. Many foreign film producers omit to put even a credit at the end of the film to say that the filming was done in Canada.

Honourable senators, I do not want to go on at length, but I wish to draw to the attention of this house an interesting comment made by Margot Kidder, one of Canada's outstanding actresses. I quote from a Canadian Press report of February 13 which appeared in newspapers across the country:

Margot Kidder is no flag-waver, but the feisty, green-eyed actress is sick of appearing in movies that disguise the Canadian locations where they were filmed.

She's lost count of the times Toronto and Vancouver have been made to resemble New York.

All three Superman films, which gave Canadian-born Kidder huge exposure in the U.S. as the Man of Steel's gal, were shot in Canada. But moviegoers certainly didn't think Metropolis was a Canadian city.

Banff is the location for Kidder's latest film, a CBS TV movie, Hoax. CBS took Western Canada's tourist mecca—the town lures thousands yearly from the U.S., Japan, West Germany and other countries—and turned it into an unidentified American Rockies ski resort.

What good is that for Canadian tourism when people go to that show and come out saying, “Gosh, I have to get down to Colorado as soon as possible to spend my tourist dollars there,” when it is Banff all the time?

A U.S. flag hangs outside the chamber of commerce building, which doubles as the film's police station. Actors playing policemen resemble state troopers, with eagle emblems pasted on their car doors.

• (1430)

Changing licence plates and having American dollars is really silly, said this outstanding Canadian actress:

When asked why one of Canada's most recognizable tourist attractions can't be just that—recognizable—

The production people said:

“American audiences like to see American things.”

Not other things. To continue:

She gritted her teeth in exaggerated frustration, staring up at the tall pines and icy blue sky.

“It's crazy,” Kidder said. “Nobody cares. If it's good they'll watch it and if it's not, they won't.”

I will not continue reading from that newspaper article. As I stated at the outset, I am not blaming this government alone because the same problem presented itself under the predecessor government. Many of these film companies receive federal financial assistance and federal marketing assistance, as honourable senators know. There are substantial advantages if they film in Canada and use Canadian production crews or Canadian actors. The companies enjoy, as well, certain Commonwealth distribution benefits as a result of filming in Canada. We should ask or require something in return.

Will the federal government attempt to persuade the Canadian Film Development Corporation to establish, as a condition of Canadian assistance in its various forms, insofar as it is possible, adequate identification of Canadian filming sites as Canadian, so that we can bring a few tourists into this country?

An Hon. Senator: Well done!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the one thought that comes to my mind in that eloquent statement is that any movie producers who can persuade knowledgeable people that Winnipeg is the same as Chicago deserve a little admiration, because surely if ever there is a cinematographic sleight of hand, that must be it! And all I can say is, thank God the Arctic is Arctic, because they are not going to be able to palm that off as something in New Mexico.

My honourable friend raises an interesting point. It is even worse than that, really, because when we get our own Canadian moviemakers making movies in Canada, we have a hard time persuading some of them to make movies that are identifiably Canadian. Sometimes they are the third or fourth rate spin-offs of some trash we have already seen from some place else. So we have a big problem. All we know is that the efforts of the government—and of the previous one in particular, because I believe they were the initiators of the program of giving government money to moviemakers—have not achieved the success that we had hoped for.

The mere fact that we are able to get some American companies to produce their movies in Canada is something. At least we have got them up here and they are taking advantage of our facilities and using, sometimes, the talents of our people—and that, of course, is something that we are all very pleased about.

Now, I guess the problem is how to get them to say “filmed in Canada” on those films, to show the world just what kind of a place we are.

I will take my honourable friend's inquiry under consideration. I do not know whether I can give him an answer. I can tell him that the Minister of Communications is at present engaged in conversations with his provincial colleagues, who are important in this field, to devise a movie-making policy for Canada that is better than the one we have—because I certainly think that can be done. Meanwhile, I thank my honourable friend for his interesting discourse.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SOUTH AFRICA—APARTHEID—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO ADOPT UNITED NATIONS CONVENTION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, in light of the government's preoccupation with human rights at home, perhaps we might turn to the subject of human rights abroad. In light of the recent statements of the federal government and the Prime Minister condemning the apartheid laws in South Africa, when will the government move to adopt the United Nations convention to suppress and outlaw apartheid as being contrary to international law?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend that at the last Commonwealth conference in Bermuda, the nations that attended, a good many of which are frontline states in southern Africa, agreed on a common policy. One of the significant initiatives adopted then was to arrange for a group of persons called “The Eminent Persons Committee” to visit South Africa in the name of the Commonwealth to attempt to open up negotiations on the whole question of apartheid.

The Canadian member of “The Eminent Persons Committee” is Archbishop Scott, the Primate of the Anglican Church in Canada. Also members of the committee are distinguished representatives from Nigeria and Australia and two other Commonwealth countries. An advance guard has already been sent to South Africa—or they will be going very soon—in order to make a preliminary sortie and to see what kind of prospects they find ahead of them. It would behoove us, as a matter of policy, to allow “The Eminent Persons Committee”—supported as it is by Zimbabwe, Malawi, Zambia, Lesotho, Swaziland and Botswana—all countries that are on the South African border—and endorsed by those nations, to say nothing of the rest of the Commonwealth, to do what it can before we consider further steps.

Senator Grafstein: As the Leader of the Government can see, this causes some difficulty to other nations which have decided vigorously not only to speak against apartheid, to take steps to reduce and suppress apartheid, but also to adopt domestically the UN convention suppressing and outlawing apartheid as being contrary to international law. Decisive action by Canada would be an additional signal to that country that Canadians view apartheid as an abhorrent practice. I do not see the two actions as being contrary to one another, or why one should await the other initiative.

Therefore, I would ask the Leader of the Government to take our thoughts to the government and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the hope that he might, as an additional step, accelerate the adoption of that convention in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not think that I would give that undertaking, because I believe that the combined unanimous judgment of the Commonwealth countries, which are most closely associated with this matter, is the guideline that we should follow at the present time. They did not consider it productive or constructive at that particular time to move beyond the position they took in Bermuda, and I think it would be rash for me to suggest that another course would be more desirable until we have played out that option.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION OR DIVERSION PROGRAM

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to return to a question raised a few moments ago by my colleague Senator Bonnell. I want to deal with the regional problem concerning the potato industry.

The Honourable Leader of the Government will remember that last year I raised with him on a number of occasions the matter of the unfortunate decision reached by the government abolishing a commission which was inquiring into the potato industry.

At that time, I predicted that the problems faced by that industry in Eastern Canada would not disappear for all that. After some time, I knew that the industry would again knock on our doors asking for help. Unfortunately, it has happened once more this year. I described the problem as a cyclical one. In spite of repeated efforts by the previous government, especially the then Minister of Agriculture, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, to find solutions to that problem, the conclusion was that a royal commission of enquiry might finally throw some light on that industry's complex problems.

Unfortunately, this government has chosen to abolish that commission. This is why once more the potato industry is coming to a deadlock. Last fall's potato crop is virtually being given away.

This is a very serious problem. I wholeheartedly support the comments made by my colleague from Prince Edward Island. I would ask the Leader of the Government if he will try with all possible speed to convince his cabinet colleagues of the urgency this year of helping in some way that sector of the Canadian farming industry.

As many others, I fear that if the provincial and federal governments cannot find a solution or solutions for establishing a marketing board for eastern Canada or other mechanisms, many family farms will have to shut down. Of course, big business will make a grab at this most valuable prime land for practically nothing.

If this government is truly interested in maintaining the concept of family farming in Canada, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate agree to be our spokesman and as rapidly as possible make his government aware of the very serious problems faced by that industry? I would be eternally grateful to him.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is the same question that was previously asked by Senator Bonnell, and I give my honourable friend the same answer.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I do not want to argue with the Leader of the Government. However, during his quite legitimate absence the week of February 6, I asked the same question of the Deputy Government Leader, Senator Doody, and outlined the same concerns with the same urgency. Senator Doody promised to look into the matter for me. In view of the present crisis in the potato industry, it is not enough to look into the matter.

The situation is rather like that of the sugar-beet industry. Many producers are faced with bankruptcy.

Is it the policy of the government to let these agricultural sectors disappear? Is it the policy of this government to let market forces operate freely and too bad if century-old family businesses are destroyed?

[English]

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend wants to debate the issue, why does he not submit an inquiry? I cannot debate it on the floor of the Senate during Question Period.

[Translation]

Senator Corbin: I find the attitude of the Leader of the Government regrettable. When I ask questions, he never wants to debate them. When certain other senators ask questions, he makes lengthy speeches.

Is he interested in the potato industry or not? I have heard enough pious words. I could give you shovelfuls of such words.

Senator Flynn: That is certainly true.

Senator Corbin: Here is Senator Flynn once again!

I simply note, honourable senators, that the government spokesmen sneer when we raise the serious problems of the potato industry. I could not expect anything else on their part. Thank you.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am neither sneering nor laughing at my honourable friend. If he wants an answer to his previous question, my honourable colleague, Senator Doody, is a man of his word, and he will get the answer. As to the nature of my responses, perhaps it may be attributed to the fact that I do not know as much about potatoes as I do about some other subjects.

CONCENTRATION CAMPS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In the early 1980s when the Conservatives formed Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in the other place, some insinuations were made to the effect that the government of the day was establishing concentration camps in Canada. Now that the honourable gentlemen opposite have been in government for one year and a half or so, have they found any evidence of the existence of such places and, if so, are there any inmates in them?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if my honourable friend will furnish me with the details of what the accusation is, who made it, what was said and when, perhaps we could investigate it. But on the basis of a general statement such as my honourable friend has given, there is nothing I can say.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have several delayed answers to questions.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

ALLEGED CONDUCT OF FORMER CORPORAL

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 19 last by the Honourable Senator Frith.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I hear that one, please?

Senator Roblin: Certainly. It is a great answer.

The honourable senator's question does not fall within the administrative responsibility of the government.

Senator Frith: What was the question?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Roblin: It is in Hansard.

Senator Frith: I have about 20 questions that have not been answered and I do not know which one is being answered.

An Hon. Senator: Take any one of them.

Senator Frith: What was the question that did not fall within something or other? What was the question that did not fall in the right place?

Senator Roblin: My problem is that the answers do not include the questions. It says that it is in response to a question asked in the Senate on June 19, 1985, by the Honourable Royce Frith regarding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police—Alleged Conduct of Former Corporal. The answer is:

The honourable senator's question does not fall within the administrative responsibility of the government.

(Later)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, following the example that Senator Roblin used when he sat on this side, I would like to ask a question arising out of the reply to my question. I now remember my question. I believe it dealt with an RCMP corporal who was alleged to have been an informant for the Honourable Elmer MacKay. My question is: What does the reply mean?

Senator Roblin: It simply means that the episode that took place was outside the administrative competence and jurisdiction of the government.

THE ENVIRONMENT

TOXICOLOGY RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on December 17 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding The Environment—Toxicology Research and Development—Government Policy.

While there continues to be a high level of concern for the toxic problems in the Great Lakes, most recently in the Sarnia area, the solution of problems there have not been hampered thus far by lack of research or technical expertise, and considerable additional resources were allocated to effectively deal with the situation.

Insofar as a toxicology centre at Guelph, there continues to be a question as to the most effective allocation of federal resources as well as a continued level of active interest at Guelph.

A considerable amount of broadly-based toxicology research is already being done in Canada at present. It is important to note that four university-affiliated centres for toxicology already exist in Canada—a lot of it supported by federal and provincial funds. We must add to this the toxicology research activities in private sector laboratories and in federal and provincial government departments and agencies.

In addition, on June 4, 1985, the federal Environment Minister established the Wildlife Toxicology Fund. This fund is administered by the World Wildlife Fund on behalf of the Government of Canada, with the administrative costs covered by a "no strings attached" grant from a company from the private sector, namely Noranda Inc. The new fund will support high quality scientific work in universities and other non-government research institutions. Areas of research will include: effects of agricultural and forestry chemicals and other toxic pollutants on wildlife; monitoring of the success of measures to mitigate these effects; development and implementation of techniques that use wildlife as indicators for toxic chemicals in the environment; and environmental pathways by which toxic substances may affect wildlife.

Any decision to allocate further federal funds to toxicology research, can only be made on the basis of the information currently being collected on Canada's toxicology research needs. In January 1985, the federal and provincial deputy ministers of the environment identified the need to review the toxicology research requirements of governments and industry. Accordingly three studies are currently underway. Environment Canada is examining government needs in toxicology research; the Science Council of Canada is assessing the strengths and weaknesses of toxicology in Canada; and the National Research Council is updating an earlier report on toxicology in Canada. To date, Environment Canada's consultations with industry have revealed little demand for services that cannot be met by parent companies abroad or by existing Canadian capacity. The provinces are currently responding to the Environment Canada questionnaire on toxicology needs. Once the Minister and his officials have reviewed all relevant information, the Government of Canada will be in a better position to decide what further federal funds should be allocated to toxicology research.

JUSTICE

CANADA COMMISSION OF INQUIRY ON WAR CRIMINALS—COST AND SCOPE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on January 30 last by the Honourable Senator Haidasz regarding Justice—Canada Commission of Inquiry on War Criminals—Cost and Scope.

Application for funding is before Treasury Board. No dollar figures are now available.

The U.S.S.R. has not yet replied to the commission's request regarding travel and investigations. No decision has yet been made as to whether the commission will travel outside Canada. This is a decision entirely within the commission's mandate, and not one to be made by the government.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—DISPARITY IN CRITERIA FOR PAYMENTS TO GRAIN PRODUCERS AND BEEF PRODUCERS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 4 last by the Honourable Senator Argue regarding Agriculture—Western Canada—Drought Conditions—Government Assistance—Disparity in Criteria for Payments to Grain Producers and Beef Producers.

Beef producers have no means of insuring livestock feed supplies against the effects of drought except in a few areas where crop insurance offers forage coverage. Crop producers, on the other hand, can protect themselves against significant drought loss by participating in the crop insurance program.

Crop insurance is designed to cover only the variable costs of a farming operation. The debt load arising from unpaid, fixed costs can rise significantly each year. Consequently, the farmers in the worst financial condition are those who have experienced successive years of drought. Averaging data over the three year period reflects the repetitive nature of the loss.

Farmers outside the drought area can request a review of their situation by completing an Application for Review and forwarding it to the drought office. Once the applications are received, they will be grouped to determine eligibility and level of payment on the same basis as those already within the drought area.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO IRELAND— ALLEGED PARTISANSHIP OF APPOINTEE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 4 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding External Affairs—Appointment of Canadian Ambassador to Ireland—Alleged Partisanship of Appointee.

It is not appropriate for Canadian Ambassadors to comment as described.

All representatives of Canada are governed by the Code of Conduct Guidelines.

While Mr. McDermott has been appointed Ambassador-designate to Ireland, he has not yet presented his letter of credentials to the Irish government, nor assumed such responsibilities.

It is the Department's understanding that Mr. McDermott will do so upon his official arrival in Dublin in May, at which time he will have, of course, resigned from his position with the Canadian Labour Congress.

PUBLIC WORKS

CLEANING SERVICES—POSSIBLE LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 4 last by the Honourable Senator Marsden regarding Public Works—Cleaning Services—Possible Lay-off of Employees.

Several months ago, the government announced its intention to reduce the work force in the federal Public Service by 15,000 person-years over the next five years. As part of this downsizing, Treasury Board instructed the Department of Public Works to reduce its work force by 549 person-years by the end of the 1986/87 fiscal year.

On October 4th of last year, Public Works Canada forwarded a surplus employee notice to 304 of its employees. Among these are 265 cleaning workers providing services to Canada Post facilities. This group includes 55 women and 180 persons over 50 years of age.

Cleaning services represent an important part of the corporation's accommodations costs, that is about 14 per cent. It is possible to obtain these services at a lesser cost from the private sector. It is estimated that these cleaning costs can be reduced by 3 million dollars a year (which represents about 2%).

The statement by John Gordon of the Public Service Alliance is speculative. It is not necessarily true that private sector employees are paid the minimum wage nor that the quality of the cleaning services will be reduced.

Since October 4, 1985, when the 304 surplus notices were issued at Public Works Canada, efforts to facilitate redeployment have included;

- a departmental staffing clearance system, whereby all proposed staffing actions are reviewed centrally and potentially qualified priority candidates are referred for consideration.

- counselling services, by staffing officers, corporate staffing, the PSC and employee assistance programme coordinators who are professional counsellors. Staffing officers have received training to assist them in providing effective counselling services.

- job search activities, including contacts and marketing with both other departments and agencies and outside organizations.

Barriers to the successful redeployment of affected employees are;

- that many live in small towns where there are few job opportunities. Relocation to larger centres is difficult because of the higher cost of living.

- that most of the functions being performed by these employees are being discontinued for referral to similar positions.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 5 last by the Honourable Senator Guay regarding Canada-United States Relations—Trans-border Pollution Problems.

The United States' program to locate a site for its second nuclear waste repository identified 20 potential areas for field studies in a January 16, 1986 draft report which will be finalized this summer. Eight of these areas are in Minnesota, 4 of which are in the Red River basin. No potential areas are in North Dakota. After the field studies, 3 potential areas will be selected in 1991 for intensive investigations, leading to a final selection of one site in 1998.

The Canadian Government was informed of this program last spring and immediately told the United States that any site selected for a U.S. nuclear waste repository must present no risk to this or future generations of Canadians or to the Canadian environment.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Hon. J. Clark, and the U.S. Secretary of State, George Shultz, have discussed this issue several times and established Canada-U.S. consultations to ensure Canadian views are addressed by the United States in a timely and effective manner. As a result of these consultations, an area on the Quebec-Maine border near Lac Mégantic, Quebec was dropped from the January report and no areas were identified within 40 kilometres of Canada. The Ministers of the Environment and Energy, Mines and Resources have also raised this issue with their U.S. counterparts.

In addition to continuing consultations, the United States has agreed that no area would be selected that would require field work in Canada and has pledged that the 15-year screening process is intended to ensure no site will be selected which will have harmful effects on either side of the border.

The federal government is meeting with the provinces concerned with this issue in preparation for the next consultations with the U.S., which we expect to take place in March or April.

COMMUNICATIONS

MUSEUM OF MAN—CHANGE OF NAME

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 6 last by the Honourable Senator Robichaud and the Honourable Senator Bosa regarding Communications—Museum of Man—Change of Name.

The Minister of Communications announced on January 24, 1986, the creation of a jury to decide on a new name for the Museum of Man. The National Museums of Canada, after more than a year of public input and discussion was unable to resolve the questions.

The Minister stressed that the new name will reflect the new realities of the Museum, now under construction in Parc Laurier in Hull. As the building will be more than simply a container of artifacts, "it will be a living testament to the richness of Canadian history", the Minister stated. It was decided by both the National Museums of Canada and the Minister that a change of name for the new museum, more in keeping with its new mandate, would be appropriate. It also follows the policy of changing names and titles, i.e. from Manpower and Immigration to Employment and Immigration; man years to person years, etc. in keeping with the new realities of the 1980s.

HUMAN RIGHTS

SASKATCHEWAN—PASSAGE OF BILL 144 IMPOSING SETTLEMENT ON GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 6 last by the Honourable Senator Argue regarding Human Rights—Saskatchewan—Passage of Bill 144 Imposing Settlement on Government Employees.

The government is not prepared to initiate a direct reference to the Supreme Court of Canada to question the validity of the Saskatchewan back-to-work legislation and its resort to section 33 of the Charter.

The Supreme Court has expressed concern about dealing with complex constitutional questions in the abstract and it is in the view of the government undesirable to refer complicated questions without ensuring an adequate factual background for the Supreme Court's determination.

Issues relating to section 33 are now pending in a number of cases before the Supreme Court of Canada which will likely provide guidance on the circumstances or criteria for applying the override clause. It would be preferable for any affected individuals who wish to challenge the validity of the Saskatchewan legislation to do so in the normal course of judicial proceedings.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

RESOLUTION APPROVING CONFERRING OF HONORARY CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP—NOTIFICATION TO U.S.S.R.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 11 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Raoul Wallenberg—Resolution Approving Conferring of Honorary Canadian Citizenship—Notification to U.S.S.R.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I have that answer read?

Senator Roblin: Certainly. This is the reply:

With the Canadian connection to the Wallenberg case heightened by the Parliamentary resolution, the Canadian Embassy in Moscow raised his case with officials from the Soviet Foreign Ministry on February 11. The Soviet authorities were informed of Mr. Wallenberg's new status as an honorary Canadian citizen and were told of Parliament's dissatisfaction with the unsupported Soviet assertions of his death in 1947. Canadian Embassy officials urged the Soviet authorities to explain Mr. Wallenberg's situation. I regret to say that the Soviet authorities were not at all forthcoming in their response.

The government will persist in seeking to ascertain the fate of this courageous honorary Canadian citizen.

FRANCOPHONE SUMMIT

STATUS OF PREMIER OF NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 18 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding the status of the Premier of New Brunswick.

Yes, the status of New Brunswick and Quebec is identical.

PUBLIC PENSIONS REPORTING BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), for Senator Robertson, moved the third reading of Bill C-255, to impose reporting requirements with respect to public pension plans and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Robertson, who is occupied with the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, I would like to commend the mover of this bill in the other place, Mr. Paul McCrossan, on a rather singular achievement in managing to get a private member's bill through the House with the unanimous support of all parties. I understand that the same happy situation occurred in the committee of the Senate in which the bill was considered. Mr. McCrossan was congratulated by the members of the committee and they indicated their unanimous support for the bill.

I would like to add my words of congratulation to him and commend this bill for third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-55, intituled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976".

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps you will allow me a moment or two to speak of the contribution that has been made to our examination of immigration procedures by Rabbi Gunther Plaut. He is a scholar of great distinction and has been in the front lines of human rights activism for decades. The Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled his report on Refugee Determination in the other place on June 17, 1984, calling it a diligent, excellent work. At that time, the minister promised that the report and public response to it will form the basis of a major overhaul of legislation affecting refugee determination later this year. There are 89 recommendations to be dealt with as well as attitudinal responses that will challenge the Canadian conscience in determining far into the future our willingness to share the riches we have in such abundance in Canada, and to share also the talents and skills of those people who will be coming to Canada.

It is not surprising that there is little argument that we should rush into massive change without the study and the consultation that will ensure support and enthusiasm for what the minister called "a new determination process" down the road; a process which might be outlined later this year and be fully in place within two years to meet the needs of Canadians and those who wish to become Canadians.

That, honourable senators, is what we have to look forward to. However, there are desperately urgent matters to be dealt with first, and that is why we have before us today this bill to amend the Immigration Act. If we do not grasp the opportunity at this time to put our house in order, we will have so clogged the system of immigration appeal as to make it totally unworkable. Five-year waits in processing would invite the conclusion that we have no sensible intention of coming to grips with the real problems of individuals who are anxious to argue that their situations should be put before an appeals board and merit the consideration of a decision on their immigration refugee status.

Urgency has been heaped upon urgency by the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada that every refugee applicant is entitled to a full oral hearing. No longer will rejection of written application be the final word. The Immigration Appeal Board faces a mounting task in dealing with its existing caseload, and the probability of increasing applications for appeals. The Honourable Walter McLean, Minister of State for Immigration, has indicated that the backlog of cases in this system has risen to 20,000, and somewhere between 700 and 800 new applicants are being added every month.

In addition to the foregoing, honourable senators, there has been a steady accumulation in the other parts of the board's workload which is every bit as important as refugee claims. These are the immigration appeals against the refusal of sponsored applications—in short, family re-unification cases. There are over 1,500 appeals of all forms waiting to be resolved, and the current backlog means a wait of almost 24 months before a case will be heard.

What is to be done, honourable senators? That is why we have Bill C-55 before us. This bill provides the bare necessities of updating and facilitating the Immigration Act, 1976 during a period when reasoned consideration of the old act in its entirety will be taken into account. The following are some of the amendments to the existing act: The Immigration Appeal Board, which presently consists of not more than 18 members, may be increased up to 50 members who will be appointed to deal with the hearings in the manner in which the Supreme Court of Canada rightly insists upon, as well as hearing other appeals. This expansion will be phased in over a period of time, and as the need dictates.

The number of members of the board who can be designated as vice-chairmen shall be increased from 5 to 13. The chairman and a majority of the vice-chairmen shall be barristers or advocates of at least five years' standing and experience at the bar of a province. The chairman may delegate all or part of her or his powers and duties to a vice-chairman.

As a further provision, authority to hear some of the board's caseload will be provided for single members of the board in certain technical areas only. In all other areas of the board's jurisdiction, notably claims for refugee redetermination or appeals of sponsorship refusals, a single member will be used only if both parties consent. Otherwise, these appeals must be heard by a three-member panel.

The bill will abolish the board's authority to dispose of unmeritorious applications summarily on prima facie evidence. It will require that a full oral hearing be accorded to all applicants, in accordance with the Supreme Court of Canada decision.

The right of appeal that has been provided heretofore and was available only to Canadian citizens sponsoring an immigrant will now be expanded to permanent resident sponsors. This is a term that has supplanted the term "landed immigrant." We are told that the board's workload in this area alone might increase by a further 200 cases per year.

The Supreme Court of Canada found that existing procedures did not afford refugee claimants fundamental justice. This bill enables the Immigration Appeal Board to allow persons who have been ordered removed from Canada, or persons in Canada whose relatives have been refused admission to Canada, an independent court to which they may appeal such decisions not only on legal grounds but also on discretionary or humanitarian grounds, and to permit the redetermination of refugee claims.

Honourable senators, I would here like to quote from a statement by the Honourable Walter McLean, Minister of Immigration:

This act is an effective humanitarian response to a critical situation that is causing hardship for many people.

Honourable senators, this is a straightforward legislative step which deserves the support of the Senate.

● (1500)

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I should like to congratulate Senator Baroote on giving us a clear explanation of Bill C-55, and also for having made a reference to Rabbi Plaut's report. I, too, in my remarks intend to make reference to his report.

Although Bill C-55 appears to make only very minor changes to the Immigration Appeal Board, the Liberals have nevertheless opposed it. To understand why, one must be aware of the background of the bill. I speak of Canada's slow progress towards a new refugee-status determination process.

In the past few years it has become increasingly clear that the current refugee-status determination process is a cumbersome, time-consuming one that does not meet Canada's high standards of fundamental justice. I want to make it clear that here we are discussing only people who make a claim in Canada that they are refugees. Under our international commitments, Canada must give these people a chance to have their claim decided, because we are under an obligation not to send true refugees back to countries where they fear they will be persecuted because of their race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or political opinion.

Refugees, church groups, helping societies and immigration lawyers have been saying for years that Canada's method of determining whether or not refugee claims are justified was unfair. In April of this year, the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court of Canada, agreed with them and declared part of the Immigration Act unconstitutional. The part of the process singled out in this case was the power given to the Immigration Appeal Board to make decisions in refugee redetermination matters—appeals really—without any requirement that the board actually see and hear the refugee claimant. At no other stage either did a claimant appear in person before an actual decision-maker. The Supreme Court declared that an oral hearing was essential in light of the importance of the decision to refugee-status claimants—in many cases it is actually a question of life or death. The court declared that the board must hold oral hearings in every refugee case that comes before it. Clause 5 of Bill C-55 requires this.

If the refugee-status determination process could be cured by the addition of clause 5, the Liberals would wholeheartedly support the bill. Unfortunately, this is not the case. The process has deficiencies at every stage. The claimant tells his or her story in the first instance to a senior immigration officer, who has no power to make any decision on the matter, nor indeed is the officer trained to do so. The transcript of that examination is then forwarded to an advisory body to the minister, the Refugee Status Advisory Committee. The committee reads the transcript and makes a recommendation to the minister, or the minister's delegate, on whether the claimant is or is not a true refugee as Canada understands that term under the Geneva Convention.

Honourable senators will note that the people who make this first decision, the committee members, do not, in the normal course of events, see the claimants, although pilot projects where members sit in on the initial examination have been very successful and the committee is to be commended on its initiative. It is where the minister, and the committee, have turned down a claimant that the case goes to the Immigration Appeal Board, as I described earlier.

As a result of the fact that the system is so cumbersome, a very large refugee claimant backlog has accumulated, which now totals close to 19,000 people. The bottlenecks in the system existed even before the Supreme Court of Canada decision requiring an oral hearing and have become worse because of it. This explains, at least in part, why clause 1 of Bill C-55 increases the number of members of the board from 18 to 50. The board has a large backlog of its own of which fully one half are refugee cases and the other half are sponsorship appeals.

I have described the refugee-status determination system in some detail because it is important to understand that the whole process must be changed. An oral hearing at a later stage in the game will just not do. The government agrees with this as well.

Over the recent past, a number of studies have been undertaken to propose ways of changing the system. The most recent was Rabbi Plaut's thorough and sensitive report, which contained a great number of recommendations for the overhaul of the system. The House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration studied his report intensively and made further recommendations. The government has stated that it is committed to revising the system very shortly.

It should be clear by now why we have strong reservations about this bill. Increasing the number of members on the board and continuing to let the board hear redetermination cases only sends claimants through an unfair process at a faster pace. We need more fundamental change and that is why we have such reservations about Bill C-55.

There are some good features in this bill, which my honourable friend has mentioned. Clause 6 gives permanent residents the right to appeal sponsorship cases, a right reserved until now to Canadian citizens. It is very proper that this change be made now that our Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equality under the law. The expanded workload and the backlog in sponsorship appeals clearly mean the board needs more members and we support this aspect of the bill. We also support the amendment to the bill, accepted by the House of Commons Legislative Committee, that would continue to require a three-member panel to hear these sponsorship appeals. These are not minor or technical matters; they affect the lives of people in important ways and must be heard by three people.

Despite the good features of this bill, our concerns about true reform of the refugee system remain. We trust that the government will move quickly to implement the recommendations of the Plaut Report and the standing committee so that Bill C-55 does not prove to be a band-aid solution where radical surgery was necessary.

I also wish to take this opportunity to make some general comments on the Immigration Act and the current direction of the government's immigration policy. My observations on the act reflect my long-standing concern that the true multicultural nature of the Canadian mosaic should be reflected in its laws and institutions wherever possible. I have long been disappointed in the fact that our Immigration Act, which came into force in 1978, does not make reference to multiculturalism as an objective of Canadian policy. Section 3 of our act states only that it is an objective of Canadian immigration policy, and I quote:

—to enrich and strengthen the Cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal and bilingual character of Canada.

The word "multiculturalism" should have been inserted so it would read:

—taking into account the federal bilingual and multicultural character of Canada.

True it is that Canada is a federal country; true also that it is bilingual. But to overlook Canada's multicultural heritage is to miss the essence of what makes Canada the great country it is today.

I wish to point out to honourable senators that when this act was being debated on third reading in 1977 there was an amendment proposed that would have made the multicultural nature of Canada a factor to be taken into account in our immigration policy. This amendment was supported by the Progressive Conservatives in the House, although it did not become part of the policy. I wish to remind honourable senators opposite of their commitment to multiculturalism in 1977, and ask if Canada can soon expect to see an amendment of this nature to the Immigration Act? We now have section 27 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which makes specific reference to the multicultural nature of Canada. We should take this opportunity to reflect this renewed commitment to multiculturalism in the Immigration Act.

The second general issue I wish to raise concerns the emphasis of the present government on economic immigration. On January 1 of this year, a number of important changes to the regulations came into effect. A new category of investor was introduced, which makes it seem that Canada favours immigrants who are wealthy. Moreover, the point system was revised upward to make it more difficult for many potential immigrants to come to Canada.

It may well be that wealthy immigrants create jobs, but so do other immigrants. Canada owes a great debt to past immigrants who came to Canada, found jobs, started businesses, employed others and contributed substantially to the growth of the economy. They did this without having to prove that they were investors with a minimum net worth, or entrepreneurs in the eyes of immigration officers.

I urge the government to dispel this notion and to undertake a study of sponsored immigrants who have come to Canada in the last 40 years. I predict that we would learn that these people were entrepreneurs; that they invested in Canada and, in so doing, both they and Canada prospered. Jobs are created by immigrants' hard work and commitment to their new country, and I am sure that a study of the kind I have proposed would bear that out.

One of the ways in which Canada speaks to the world is through its Immigration Act. As one of the few countries still receiving immigrants—the United States and Australia being the others—we should be telling prospective immigrants that Canada values its multicultural heritage, wishes to enhance it and welcomes them whether they arrive with significant sums of money in their pockets or not. We know that their will to succeed and their work ethic make up for any lack of capital they may have. I urge the government not to turn aside from our immigration policy which has worked so well for Canada in the past.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

3:08 An account that is not provided for in the budget of a committee shall not be paid.

THE SENATE

Thursday, March 6, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Honourable Martial Asselin, P.C., Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

Prayers.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 11th March, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could the Deputy Leader of the Government tell us what business we might expect next week?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the most pressing item on the agenda is Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973. We hope that the committee will have finished its study of the bill, since it has been engaged in that study for quite some time. In anticipation of its return to the chamber, it is, of course, our responsibility to be here to deal with it.

Senator Frith: I was not suggesting that we should not be here.

Senator Doody: I should stop for the "editorials".

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Doody: It is our hope that Bill C-65, to amend the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act and other Acts in consequence thereof, will also be returned to this chamber from committee. Bill C-55, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, is now before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

In addition to those bills, we have approximately 20 items on the order paper which I think can properly be dealt with next week. Therefore, if we apply ourselves, we will have a fairly full week ahead of us.

Senator Frith: Then, if I understand the answer correctly, our work will centre largely around third reading debate.

Senator Doody: I believe that is correct, from the present perspective, barring some unforeseen push from the House of Commons. However, we do not anticipate anything of that sort at this time.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

INDUSTRY

SHIPBUILDING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, representatives of workers in the shipbuilding industry are present on the Hill today, parading and protesting. I remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate that in August of 1984, before the last general election, the position of his party was expressed as follows:

A top priority of a P.C. government will be to create a more viable and prosperous shipbuilding industry. In achieving this goal, we will consult with provincial governments, maritime industries and labour. We will submit the following proposals to these groups during the consultative process.

Included in that statement was an extension of support for Atlantic ship repair facilities and dockyards.

Senator Perrault: Sunk out of sight!

Senator Frith: No, worse than sunk out of sight and worse than forgotten. The matter was not forgotten because Michael Wilson has since stated, in his budget speech:

We are eliminating programs such as . . . the Shipbuilding Industry Assistance Program.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Frith: Can the Leader of the Government tell me, first, whether there was consultation with labour before eliminating the programs that the government said it was going to increase?

An Hon. Senator: Never!

Senator Frith: Second, whether there is a plan to consult with the representatives who are on the Hill and whether the government will listen to them while they are here?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am afraid that I will have to take those questions as notice.

Senator Frith: Lost! So is the question. I will hear about it in June 1988!

Senator Roblin: I will do better than that.

[Later]

Senator Frith: May I remind the Leader of the Government, who took my first question as notice and undertook to try to get the information, that part of my question was as to whether or not a meeting would be taking place today and whether or not there were any plans to consult with the representatives of the shipyard workers today. That question should be answered. Perhaps he can give us an answer on that part of the question before we adjourn.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not think I can undertake to do that.

THE BUDGET

IMPACT OF PROVISIONS ON FIREFIGHTING PERSONNEL AT AIRPORTS

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It is one that he will have to take as notice, because I know that he will not have the answer today. However, I hope that he will be able to get it for me.

There was reference in the budget to loss of jobs in the Department of Transport. I would like to know whether any of those jobs will be related to airport firefighting, either to the administration or to the firefighters themselves. Is there any intention of cutting the firefighting facilities at the various airports across Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is perfectly true that the government intends to reduce the size of the Public Service by some 2 per cent a year for the next little while, totalling some 15,000 jobs, almost all of which, if not all of which, will be achieved by means of retirement or natural attrition. I do not think it is the intention of the government to reduce in any way the safety procedures or personnel at airports. However, to make doubly sure, I will make a special inquiry of this matter to satisfy my honourable friend.

PROPOSED BUSINESS TRANSFER TAX

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, during the budget address the Minister of Finance indicated that he was changing the level of sales tax, that he was moving away from a value-added tax to a business transfer tax. It has been reported in the press that the chairman of the committee in the other place is already making statements concerning this new tax and what it is going to do. My question is: Does the Leader of the Government have any information regarding a timetable for bringing in this new measure?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I, too, read the report attributed to my friend, Mr. Blenkarn, but my inquiries so far indicate no basis for it in fact. One could speculate and say that undoubtedly there will be some studies made before the next budget in respect of this, because the minister said so; but to the best of my knowledge, no timetable has yet been set.

OIL PRICING—LOSS OF REVENUE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since the Leader of the Government is taking some of these questions as notice and will be obtaining some information for us, may I ask whether an estimate has been made of the loss of revenue resulting from the $13-to-$15 per barrel oil price compared to the $22.50 on which the budget was based?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question.

Senator Frith: But will you try to get the information?

Senator Roblin: I will make inquiries.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED REMARKS BY CONSERVATIVE M.P.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It is reported in today's issue of the Toronto Sun, at page 24, that Mr. Thomas Suluk, a Conservative member of Parliament representing the constituency of Nunatsiak, made an offensive and disparaging remark to Mr. Carlo Rossi, a Liberal member of the other place. I am wondering whether the Leader of the Government, the Prime Minister, or the leadership of the Conservative Party, will make a statement disassociating themselves from the remarks of the Conservative member, who appears to have refused to make an apology.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe we should take note of the fact that there are two sides to this question and that the member concerned alleges that certain remarks were made to him that were perhaps not appropriate. Since the matter is under review by the Speaker of the other place, I think we should wait and see what his decision is with respect to it.

TORONTO HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS' BILL, 1985

THIRD READING

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the third reading of Bill C-76, respecting the operation of the Toronto Island Airport by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I rise to address the proposal by Senator Davey that the proceedings of the Senate and its committees be televised. If I can use his own words, he said, "There is no better way to let Canadians see for themselves who we are and what it is we are doing." For the purposes of the debate, and while his proposition is straightforward, there are a number of points that have not been considered fully, although other honourable senators have alluded to them in their speeches on the subject.

First, let us review Senator Davey's assessment of the costs. He uses for comparison the costs incurred for installation of television equipment in the other place. He said that it cost $5 million to set up the system and another $1 million to operate it. I am sure that he will agree that there has been a marked increase in those costs due to inflation.

Senator Doody pointed out the example of the installation at Queen's Park where, when the idea of televising its proceedings first arose, it was estimated that the installation would cost between $1.5 and $2 million. However, the latest figures determined by consultants estimate the costs at $7.3 million. Therefore, when we are told that based on the experience with the House of Commons in 1977, some nine years ago, we should expect the installation of television cameras in the Senate chamber to cost approximately $6 million, we must accept this information with some skepticism.

The second factor which has not been considered, honourable senators, in Senator Davey's estimation of the costs is that the House of Commons installed its system only in the chamber itself. Senator Davey is proposing that television cameras be installed not only in the Senate chamber but also in all of the committee rooms. Therefore, even if we accept for the moment the estimate of $6 million for the installation of such a system in the Senate chamber, the overall costs for this idea would increase considerably when television cameras were provided for committees, and anyone who has read the article on the costs at Queen's Park will know what I mean.

Given these two factors, the rate of inflation since 1977 and the desire to televise the proceedings of the Senate committees, it is neither inconceivable nor unreasonable to assume that the true cost of televising the proceedings of the Senate and its committees would be somewhere between $10 million and $15 million, if not higher. The size of this estimate becomes even more alarming when it is considered that the budget to run all of the Senate's operations for this year is $27 million. Therefore, honourable senators, it can be expected that Senator Davey's proposal to televise the proceedings of the Senate and its committees would cost the Senate approximately half of its annual budget.

I was hoping that Senator Denis would be here today to listen to these figures, because I remember when I was on the other side, he used to complain that I had too many questions on the order paper and that it cost a great deal to reprint them. If he heard these figures, he would really be alarmed.

Senator Doody: They never wasted any money on the answers.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, besides the cost, the usefulness of such a system, to my mind, is also questionable. Senator Phillips has already pointed out the fact that at the present time a tape or feed of the Senate proceedings is available to members of the press gallery for use in radio broadcasts. Senator Phillips said that, to the best of his recollection, this service has never been used by any journalist. This lack of interest cannot be blamed simply on the lack of videotape to go along with the audio portions. The truth is that there is far more interest by members of the media and the public in the proceedings of the House of Commons than in those of the Senate. It is highly unlikely that the simple provision of televised proceedings from the Senate will change this fact. Anyone who thinks otherwise, in my opinion, is dreaming, unless there are some vital changes made.

Let us look, for example, at what happened here in the Senate when we sat a week or so ago while the other place was adjourned. I watched very carefully, honourable senators, and even though the House was adjourned, there was not one member of the news media in the Senate gallery for the whole of those three days. I recall one of the headlines when we were away during the Remembrance Day break when someone said that the Senate was snoozing. Certainly, in those three days while the Senate was sitting, some members of the press gallery must have been having a good sleep, too.

I also carefully watched the public gallery and consulted with Senate support staff and noted that there was a total of 41 people who sat in the gallery during those three days that the Senate sat, and that figure includes about 20 students who came in for five or ten minutes because it was part of their tour.

Again, let us look at what the results in the House of Commons have been after nine years of experience with televising. Three weekends ago, I watched a program in which Douglas Fisher, along with another member of the press gallery, interviewed the house leader in the other place on House of Commons reform. Here are three of the phrases with which they all agreed. They said that 90 per cent of the people in Canada are upset with the House. Another expression used was that this was a cat-and-dog-type action. Another expression was that the reputation of the institution is degraded. This is what television has done for them in nine years.

I wonder why Senator Davey, with all due respect, can say that television in the house has been a distinct success. How can he say, as he did in introducing this inquiry, that "it has worked well for Canadians"? If it did Senator Davey, it worked for only 10 per cent of Canadians.

Another phrase he used was, "it has brought parliamentarians directly into the homes and lives of ordinary Canadians." Evidently 90 per cent of them, according to the House Leader in the other place, are not very concerned and they are getting the door slammed in their face.

Now let's look, honourable senators, at what happened during the two-week adjournment around Remembrance Day. We adjourned on the Thursday. Remembrance Day was on the Monday. The House of Commons paid their tributes, as they do every year, and we in the Senate paid tributes, as we do every year, to the veterans. However, in the Canadian Press story the next day was headed: "Commons pays tribute to veterans." They did not say that Parliament had paid tribute.

I called them three or four years ago about this and asked, "Why do you not say that Parliament paid tribute?" I was given the answer, "Well we will change it next year." But it was not changed the next year. It never changes.

I cut out a number of articles that I saw in the newspapers commenting on the fact that we were not sitting during the two-week recess around Remembrance Day. We received more publicity when we were not here than we ever get when we are here, which brings me back to the reference to the "Senate snoozer." They know everything about us. When we are not here we get publicity in the form of editorials and CP stories such as the one I quoted from the Edmonton Journal. Furthermore, in my view, Senator Frith should not be advocating television in the Senate. He should be against it. Because, in every one of the stories he is referred to in the first two lines.

I have here an editorial which was published in the Citizen. I will just read an extract from it where the memorable words of Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, were quoted as follows: "There is no particular reason for our return." We fear that phrase will come back to haunt the honourable senator and his colleagues.

We are criticized practically everywhere. The press know how many hours we work, what we do, where we are, when we are "snoozing" or when we are not "snoozing"—yet they are never here to see what we are doing. So why do we want the cameras and the television in here? Here is what they say:

The proof of the Senate's present pointlessness emerges most eloquently from its own record. The Senate has sat all of six hours so far in November. It sat 10 hours, 10 minutes in October. It has passed six bills since Parliament resumed its current session Sept. 9.

So they are watching us somewhere—but certainly not here in the Senate. I cannot for the life of me see why we need television coverage.

I have here another item which reads:

[Senator Marshall.]

Politicians as a group are probably held in lower esteem, rightly or wrongly, than any other profession or calling. If any political party questions this I challenge them to take a poll on the subject.

So if we are not here we get a lot of publicity, but when we are here we do not get any. Honourable senators, it is very obvious that if the CBC wants to come in on the Throne Speech day we can give them permission. Similarly, if they want to televise the work of the committees we can give them permission to do so. So let them spend their money and let us spend the Senate's money for better purposes.

I wonder how we would broadcast our proceedings in view of our schedules here. I can visualize John Warren on television saying on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday: "The Senate will sit from 2 p.m. to, perhaps, 4 p.m., perhaps 4.15 p.m., perhaps 4.30 p.m. or perhaps 5 o'clock." We have no schedule in this chamber; we do not always know what we are going to do, but we always seem to find a way to change something just for the sake of changing it.

Honourable senators, I could dwell on the report of the House of Commons Reform Committee, the McGrath report, because there are enough comments by members of Parliament to make us wonder what is going on. However, I would just say that the examples I have used indicate that broadcasting has not been so successful in the other place.

While I have every respect for Senator Davey and his knowledge of the media and agree that we should let Canadians see for themselves who we are and what we are doing, I think his suggestion of broadcasting our proceedings is the last method we should use to resolve our identity problem.

On the other hand, Senator Phillips' suggestion, to my mind, is a wise one to follow. Instead of bowing again to copycatting—and whenever we have a problem we look to others such as the House of Lords in England, the Australian Parliament or the West German Parliament—we should deal with the matter ourselves. We have some of the most brilliant minds in Canada here. We should ask them what their suggestions would be. Instead of our "me-tooism" attitude to which we seem to resort, why not refer the matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration? Better still, instead of dealing with this individual matter, perhaps that committee should review all our rules and procedures in a systematic way to achieve all the reforms we need.

We should not allow ourselves to be imposed upon by the other place as we were during our last joint committee study of Senate reform where we had two chairmen from one party. We were imposed upon by members of the other place in terms of considering reforms for the Senate—which I will never understand in a million years. When House of Commons reforms are proposed, we are never asked to sit on their committees. But on our committee we had NDP members and we know when they are asked to sit on such a committee, they will immediately recommend abolishing the Senate.

Why do we kowtow to someone else instead of considering the matter reasonably and well to see how, on an overall basis, we can carry out our responsibilities as senators, as Sir John A. Macdonald said many years ago, for the betterment of the people of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, the few off-the-cuff remarks I am about to make may be construed as my participation in this debate.

My opposition to the televising of the proceedings of this chamber is well known. I am vigorously opposed to it for reasons which, to me, are obvious. Today we have listened to an excellent contribution made in the Senate by Senator Marshall. I did not time his remarks, but it seems to me they lasted between 8 and 12 minutes. His contribution could have been televised, and I am sure that everyone in this country who had turned their televisions to the channel charged with the responsibility of televising these deliberations would have been terribly pleased. But their pleasure would have lasted only between 8 and 10 minutes, today, March 6, 1986. Unfortunately, I must say that that situation would prevail most of the time. If there were sustained interest in the chamber, yes, I would be all in favour of televised proceedings of the Senate. But there isn't! We must not hide that fact from ourselves.

Honourable senators, we perform important functions both within and without this chamber, in committee and elsewhere throughout the country in our respective constituencies. It is not only within this chamber that the job of the Senate is done, so why televise it? There is nothing to televise. It would merely be something to please certain people, let us say, at the most for one hour of one day.

Honourable senators, I am not talking about the expenditure involved in such an undertaking. Senator Marshall referred to the large amount of money involved. I am not going to talk about that, although I do think it would be extravagant. I think it would be very extravagant. But it is the reason for that unnecessary extravagance that upsets me. I do not think we have one iota of justification to indulge in such extravagance.

Honourable senators, I am vigorously opposed to this proposal. Perhaps for personal reasons I should ask for it, because I do not mind appearing on television. I have done so many times in my life.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Robichaud: This does not affect me, personally, but I ask, for the sake of this institution, that we keep away from the televising of our proceedings.

On motion of Senator MacDonald (Halifax), debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 11, 1986, at 2 p.m.

YOUTH

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): My question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He is certainly aware that the Special Senate Committee report on Youth was tabled in February 1986. Recently, Senator Hébert who had chaired this committee brought the recommendations of this report to the attention of the Senate.

My question is the following: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate in a position to advise us of the government's reaction to the findings and recommendations in this report as well as its reaction to the testimonies heard at the committee hearings which are described in the report?

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, naturally the report of the Senate Committee on Youth will receive the attention of the government. However, I really think it ought to receive the attention of this chamber first. After all, the report was tabled here and the chairman of the committee, Senator Hébert, tabled a motion in the Senate calling for consideration of the report by this body. For reasons of which I am not aware, Senator Hébert did not proceed. His motion was tabled on February 19, which is a little while ago, and it seems to me we should try to devise some method, if the senator is not in his seat in the chamber in the next little while—

Senator Olson: Yes, he is.

Senator Roblin: In that case, we can ask him to proceed, if he is feeling up to it, because I realize the strain on him at this time.

Honourable senators, I do think we should devise some method to proceed with the consideration of this report because it certainly deserves that attention by the chamber.

Senator Olson: And by the government.

[Translation]

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In the meantime, do I understand that the government intends to study this report.

[English]

Senator Roblin: Yes, the government is certainly studying this report, honourable senators.

GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Lorna Marsden: My question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Now that the Minister of State (Youth) has declared, as she put it in her recent letter which has been the subject of public comment, that there has been a "significant diminution in youth-related spending, close to $100 million since the election," what are the government's plans to redress this cut and do something to help the youth of Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think if my honourable friend had been following this issue closely she would have recognized that the minister made statements with respect to this matter that left a different impression from that left by the question asked.

I think this is a matter that could well lend itself to debate rather than dealing with it on an ad hoc basis during Question Period. I hope we will be able to have such a review of the whole matter.

Senator Marsden: Do I understand from the leader's reply that it is not true that $100 million has been cut from youth-related spending since the 1984 election? Perhaps I have not followed the minister's reply closely.

Senator Roblin: I think the minister said that the moneys were transferred to other departments and were to be used for the same purposes.

Senator Marsden: May I ask the leader if he has any information with respect to how the government will address specific questions in this area? I am concerned particularly with the encouragement of youth participation in all the public bodies of Canada, youth innovations and work with other departments to broaden the agenda on youth issues.

These are not the responsibilities of the Department of Employment and Immigration or other departments.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, there are many programs relating to the activities of the government respecting the very serious problems confronting the young people of this country.

I do not want my statement to be understood as minimizing the seriousness of the problem, by any means. When we have a debate on this matter we can deal with what has happened in the recent past, what has happened to the young people, and what has happened regarding employment and things of that sort.

The question my honourable friend has asked cannot be dealt with during Question Period. If we have a debate on this subject, I will be prepared to make a further statement.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I left Ottawa somewhat sadly last week to go on a tour of penitentiaries located in western Canada with my colleague, the Honourable Senator Hastings. The sadness came about because, after a year of pressing the government for a national sugar-beet policy and stabilization payments to farmers, that policy was finally to be announced last Friday and I knew I would not be present.

I should not have worried on that score because, once again, as has happened for almost a year now, another deadline passed with no announcements having been made. The press conference was cancelled.

In view of the fact that the agriculture minister of Quebec now indicates that unless there is an announcement of a national sugar policy by this Saturday, sugar-beet production in that province will come to an end, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate finally tell us the date on which an announcement will be made so that we can give those farmers the certainty they need to make their plans?

Hon. David Roblin (Leader of the Government): When I have that information I will convey it to my honourable friend.

Hon. H. A. Olson: A supplementary question. Could the Leader of the Government give us any indication of when that might be? I do not want to get into another discussion to try to define the word "soon", but could he give us some idea when that might be?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has asked the same question as that which Senator Fairbairn has asked, and I give the same answer.

Senator Olson: That was no answer at all. The Leader of the Government said he would provide the information when he had it. I did not hear one word mentioned about when he expects such an announcement to be made. That was the point of the question I asked.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend heard correctly. I did not give any indication of when I could answer because I do not know. When I do know, I will tell my honourable friend.

Senator Frith: Some day!

Senator Argue: It is getting worse instead of better.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government aware that—and I mentioned this several days ago—there is a definite deadline for farmers to order seed so that they have it in time to produce a crop in 1986, or in any year, for that matter. There are also deadlines for ordering herbicides, fertilizers, and so forth. Senator Fairbairn has mentioned that the Quebec Minister of Agriculture has put a very specific deadline on this—I think she said Saturday.

The farmers in the province of Quebec planted a crop last year; in the southern Alberta area, they did not plant a crop last year. There is no product in the warehouses.

Therefore, will an announcement be made so that a crop can be planted this year in that part of the country?

Senator Roblin: I am taking very careful notice of these deadlines that have been set and they will be part of our calculation when we deal with this matter.

Senator Frith: The government intends to allow spring to arrive this year, does it?

Senator Roblin: As we do every year, we welcome spring. We welcome the contribution of my honourable friend too.

Senator Olson: Any intention of the government as to whether or not they will deal with the deficiency or the stabilization payments for 1983 and 1984 is one thing—and it is important, but what is more important now, in the time frames that are set up, is whether or not the producers and the processors can have a sufficient indication from the government as to what its policy may be so that they can make an arrangement to process the crop. If that is not going to be done, then there is no point in seeding it. Does the government understand that?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend has made the same point, I guess, about once every two days for the last ten days or so, and his point has registered very carefully with me. I am aware of the points that he is making, but I cannot give any answer further to the one I have already given. When I have the information, I will give it to my friend.

PUBLIC WORKS

CLEANING SERVICES—PLACEMENT OF LAID-OFF EMPLOYEES AGED FIFTY AND OVER

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, in a delayed answer on March 5 the Leader of the Government in the Senate responded to a question I had asked in February concerning lay-offs in Public Works. On March 5, I asked what proportion of the people who are being laid off are over the age of 50 and how many of them are women. My question now relates to the response, which I find even more upsetting than the original fact.

It turns out that 180 of the 265 people who have been declared, as it is put here, "surplus employees," are over the age of 50 years. Slightly less than one quarter of them, 55, are women. In responding, the leader has attempted to list the activities which are being undertaken in order to place these workers again. We find a number of measures are proposed, but then the response concludes that many of the employees live in small towns where there are few job opportunities, job relocation is difficult, and the functions that were being performed are discontinued. Can you tell us today what measures the government proposes to take to look after these people who are over 50 years of age and whose prospects in our labour force are very grim indeed?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In answering my friend's questions, we try to be as accurate and frank as we can be, so, rather than try to fudge the problem that my honourable friend refers to, we laid it out. It does represent a serious problem for which, at the present time, there is no quick or easy answer.

Senator Marsden: Can you tell me what is under way? I realize the problem is a difficult one and I appreciate the tenor of your answer, but as a member of this government, can you tell us what it is that is in mind to help those people in those circumstances—these public servants and others as well?

Senator Roblin: It is perfectly clear that in some circumstances it is not possible to do what my honourable friend wants.

TRANSPORT

FATE OF MONCTON CN SHOPS—REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT IN ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, my question is based again on what I hear day in and day out concerning the job-creation program of this government. I guess it has gone over the half million mark in the last 18 months or so, but the fact of the matter is that in every single province, and in Atlantic Canada, it is not job creation that has gone up but unemployment which has gone up drastically, if that is possible. What is going to happen to the CNR shops in Moncton is of great concern to the people of New Brunswick. Over the past 12 months, we have had statements in this regard, including those from the senator from Riverview, indicating that she had the assurance of the Minister of Transport that nothing would happen to the shops. That statement having been made, we then hear from the member from Moncton indicating that he was uncertain that that would be the case.

As late as yesterday, people in New Brunswick were listening with great attention to what was happening in Halifax when the federal Minister of Transport met with the premier. Honourable senators, the headlines in the paper, which read that there will be no help for Moncton workers in Mazankowski's transport bill, offer no reassurance to the people of New Brunswick.

The minister did make a statement to the effect that regional development, as part of the transport system, will form part of the legislation. It is hard to believe that legislation dealing with transportation, per se, will do very much for regional development in the Atlantic provinces unless, by law, the cost of transporting goods to and from the Atlantic provinces is reduced.

My question is twofold and is as follows: First, will the Leader of the Government in the Senate please try to ascertain from the government and from the Minister of Transport what is going to happen to the CNR shops in Moncton? This is a serious problem because, for years, these shops have formed part of a major industry in New Brunswick.

Second, can he enlighten us as to how the new National Transportation Act will help regional development in the Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when it comes to discussing the merits or the demerits of transportation, we will have to wait until the bill is before us, because, obviously, it would not be possible for me to anticipate that debate.

With respect to employment generally in the Atlantic provinces, which is my honourable friend's concern, there is no doubt that it is a horrendous problem. I do not attempt to conceal that for one moment. I also think it fair to say that, as the future unfolds, jobs will close down and jobs will open up. That is the nature of our economy. We cannot expect a static situation.

The government's response to this in the last budget, by setting up the Atlantic Enterprise, indicates that they are aware of this problem and are trying to do something constructive about it. It is hoped that the special financial measures—and this is not the first one; it is only the last of a number to promote the development of industry, both the manufacturing and the service industry in the Atlantic provinces—will have a beneficial effect. We are certainly going to try.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate, being from Winnipeg, surely realizes that it was a government decision—or a VIA Rail decision, as I understand it, based on instructions from the government—to build two new repair shops in Winnipeg and Montreal where repairs of cars will take place. A decision by a crown corporation has been made which will take away employment from New Brunswick.

If the Leader of the Government in the Senate has been following the reaction of small business people in the Atlantic provinces, he should realize that the so-called "great spending" of $1.5 billion in Atlantic Enterprise is really nothing more than window-dressing. We can go through the estimates with a fine-tooth comb, but we will not find one single dollar in those estimates of $110 billion that has been put aside to enhance small business in Atlantic Canada.

Senator Roblin: What is your question?

Senator Thériault: My question is: How does the Leader of the Government expect that the so-called Atlantic Enterprise Program is going to create jobs in New Brunswick? Tell us how many applications there are. How many small enterprises are able to borrow $250,000, even with the guarantee of the government?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, Question Period is supposed to be a time when we ask questions. It is not the time to make speeches to one another. I suppose I despair at ever having widespread agreement on that principle, but nevertheless I want to maintain that it is correct. If my honourable friend wants to debate the budget, there is a resolution on the order paper which provides him an opportunity to do so, and I expect that he will grasp that opportunity. I encourage him to do so. When he does, I will be replying to his remarks, in which case we can deal with the Atlantic Enterprise Program.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, every time we ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, he suggests that we discuss the matter in debate. I can tell honourable senators that as far as I am concerned we can stand at our desks and read speeches by the hour. The guy in the government can get up and read speeches by the hour—speeches that have been written by somebody else—and he will tell us what he wants to tell us and not what the people want to hear or should hear.

Senator Roblin: I daresay that my honourable friend will tell us what he wants to tell us. I do not think it has ever been any different. I think that every senator will say what he wants to say, and I do not see why complaints should be made about that. I should like to tell my honourable friend, however, for his edification, that I write my own speeches.

Senator Argue: That explains a lot.

Senator Frith: Write some answers to the questions, then!

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY—APPLICATION OF TAX INCENTIVES

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate arises out of the federal government's adherence to the Western Accord, which provides that any tax base incentives designed to stimulate investment in Canada's oil and gas industry shall be of general application to the industry, without discrimination as to the location of the activities in question or as to the ownership or control of them. In the budget there are provisions which change the investment tax credit. The general investment tax credits were eliminated in all regions of Canada except Atlantic Canada, where they were extended to offshore oil and gas activity and increased to 20 per cent from 7 per cent.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Is this a mistake or is this a difference of opinion between the Government of Canada and that of the province of Alberta, which has complained about this, as to what constitutes a tax incentive?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, for 10 or 20 years now there have been different rates of depreciation and investment incentives in force in various parts of Canada. My honourable friend is aware of that. This is not a new policy. It has been in effect for many industries besides the oil industry. The general thrust is that those disadvantaged areas of the country—in which we are including Atlantic Canada, for the purposes of this discussion—get special consideration. I do not think that that breaches any principle, nor do I think that it amounts to the introduction of a new policy.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I take it from the remarks of the Leader of the Government that it is a difference of opinion and that the federal government's position is that this is not a special tax-based incentive to the oil and gas industry in Atlantic Canada. My question, then, is: How is the government dealing with the complaint of the Province of Alberta? Are there negotiations on-going or is this a closed matter?

Senator Roblin: I should tell my honourable friend that one of the terms of the Atlantic Accord, with which he will be familiar, was that the tax regime that was available on land would also be available in the oil-bearing waters off the coast of Atlantic Canada. Bringing in this particular clause, therefore, is fulfilling an undertaking made in the Atlantic Accord, which, I think I am correct in saying, was the first of the accords that have been made.

As for a difference of opinion between the two governments, I have no statement to make on that.

HIGHER-COST PRODUCERS—MINISTER'S STATEMENT—REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I have another energy-related question. In this morning's Globe and Mail there is a statement which, although it is not a quotation, paraphrases the Minister of Energy to the effect that she expects the price of oil to rise once the higher-cost producers are driven out. It is well known that enhanced oil recovery producers and producers of synthetic crude from oil sands are higher-cost producers. Can the Leader of the Government give us the comfort of knowing that the Minister of Energy did not have in mind those producers in Canada when she spoke about higher-cost producers being driven out of the market?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is elementary, in that she was referring to the high-cost producers in the oil industry around the world. Oil prices are not set by what we do in Canada, as everyone knows very well. They are set elsewhere; and it is to the high-priced producers in other parts of the world that she made reference, because if those producers were to reduce their output for price reasons, it would certainly have a beneficial effect on other people, such as our own producers in Alberta.

INDUSTRY

LAY-OFFS AT CALGARY AND REGINA IPSCO PLANTS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, yesterday 140 hourly employees at the Calgary pipeworks of IPSCO received their lay-off notices. Lay-off notices were also sent to 555 other hourly workers to take effect between now and the end of the month. In addition—and perhaps Senator Argue was going to ask a question about this—more than half of the 1,380 employees at the IPSCO plant in Regina are now facing indefinite lay-offs by the end of this month.

Part of the reason is, of course, the decline in oil prices. Another reason is the continuing high imports of low-priced steel pipe and tube from offshore. Can the minister indicate whether the government is aware of this problem and whether it intends to take any action to protect the jobs of those people in an industry that is related to activity within the gas and oil business?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if people in the pipeline business feel that foreigners are dumping product in this country on an unfair competitive basis, there is an elaborate machinery already established by which they may appeal. The anti-dumping tribunal stands ready to hear any problems of that sort and to render a verdict based not on politics but on the economics of the situation.

Senator Olson: As a supplementary, the minister knows very well that that particular route toward finding a remedy does exist but that it takes months. These people were faced with lay-offs yesterday. They are effective right now. Other employees will be laid off between now and the end of March. I am asking if the government is aware of the problem and if it intends to take any action—because there are other ways, more immediate ways than he has suggested, of dealing with this matter.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend is really asking in a roundabout way whether we intend to do anything about the price of oil. That is the key to the problem, is it not? If the price of oil were $20 per barrel, this would not be happening. So the answer I have to give him is the same as the one I gave him before, namely, that it would be premature for us to attempt to interfere with the market system with respect to oil at the present time. That is my position and I am sticking to it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is not what I asked the Leader of the Government. I know there is a relationship there and there are actions that could be taken that would probably solve the problem; that's as obvious as saying, "If you give someone some money, they will have more than they had before." We understand that. I am asking if the government is aware of the problem as it relates to supplying secondary industries in the energy sector—in this case the steel industry, which makes tubing and pipe, an industry which is now hit with tremendous impact. Is the government aware of that and does it intend to take any action? I also mentioned the import aspect. Will the government do anything there or will it have a watching brief on this too?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, the government is aware of it, of course, and to a very acute degree. But that is not to say that at the present time we should rush in and shore up every dyke that is threatened by this flood.

[Senator Olson.]

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, my question is supplementary to that raised by Senator Hays and is related to how the market system works. When will the oil companies pass on to the consumers the benefit of lower prices? Action to do so has been taken in the United States. Our energy minister, the Honourable Pat Carney, says she is losing patience. My question is: When will the government do something about the exorbitant and extortionate prices presently being charged by the oil companies to the consumer? Prices are not going down in Canada. Why not, and why doesn't the government do something about it?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, of course, that has been my honourable friend's theme ever since he first entered public life: Why doesn't the government do something about it? Well, there are some things that the government can do and some things that the government cannot do. In connection with this particular problem, as my honourable friend knows, the difference per litre between Canada and the United States is significant. It's about six cents, and I think that is too high. Taking the tax implications into account, the net is about six cents. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources does not like it; I do not like it; and we are going to use what influence we have to try to get things speeded up.

Senator Argue: That is my question. Do you have any influence? What are you going to do? The answer was to the effect, "You shouldn't be asking the government to do something." With the greatest respect, I say that the leader's figure of six cents per litre is not correct. The difference is a lot more than that. So far, Canadians have received the benefit of a reduction of two cents per litre. I say that that is a disgrace.

Senator Roblin: We can argue about the figures; they are open to discussion. But I think that my figure is roughly within the ballpark. I repeat, the Minister of Energy has indicated her unhappiness with the situation, and I am certain that she will get something done.

Senator Argue: It has been a long time coming, and it has not come yet.

Senator Roblin: We try to satisfy my honourable friend as best we can.

Senator Argue: That is not really my point. I am concerned about the Canadian consumer, the person who goes to the pumps and who is being gouged. As I said many weeks ago, the American consumer was benefiting from the element of competition, whereas in Canada we have the worst of both worlds. We have neither government action nor the advantage of competition. The only attitude in Canada is that the consumer pays.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we intend to do our best to protect the consumer by getting prices down.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

APPOINTMENT OF FEMALES TO ADVISORY COUNCIL

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, last week we saw in the headlines an announcement by the government saying that it intended to take measures to appoint more and equal numbers of women to boards and commissions. In the same week, a colleague of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) announced the appointment of an advisory council of, I believe, nine people, all of whom—I regret to say—were men. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would inform himself and provide us with some explanation. He does not have to look very far. If he looks behind him he will see Senator Finlay MacDonald blushing with embarrassment over the error made by this minister and the government.

Senator Frith: Right to the roots of his hairs.

Senator Marsden: I wonder if the leader would find out for us why this has occurred, what the government plans to do about it, why his colleague, Senator MacDonald, would agree to serve on this unisex committee—

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Question?

Senator Marsden: Particularly when there are so many women within this country interested in amateur sport.

Senator Roblin: What is the question?

Senator Marsden: I am in the middle of my question. I am asking the leader to please find out what the government is planning to do, how it got into this situation and, particularly, whether it is considering for this board some of the young women of this country who are knowledgeable and expert in this field.

Senator Roblin: Senator MacDonald looks quite normal to me. I do not think that he is blushing.

The fact of the matter is that the minister in question did invite a number of gentlemen to join his committee. I am happy to say that the first group asked has responded positively. At the same time, he also asked two ladies to join his committee. Those invitations are still outstanding, and I do not think that the minister has heard from them yet. So the situation is not quite as desperate as my honourable friend seems to think.

Senator Marsden: I am glad to hear it. I hope the females on the advisory council will increase in number up to 50 per cent. I wonder if the leader would inquire as to whether the minister intends to have half-and-half representation.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend should take some satisfaction in knowing that the number of women the present government is appointing to these various activities is substantially in excess of anything heretofore known, particularly when she sat on the government side of this house.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have for the Leader of the Government in the Senate a supplementary question to those asked by Senator Argue. As of the last week or so, oil has been trading at between $11 and $13 per barrel. As Senator Argue has mentioned, prices at the pump have gone down by two cents per litre. In my province the price varies from 58 cents to 64 cents per litre, and as I go through Quebec and Nova Scotia I see the same prices.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is this: Will he inquire as to how much, on average, oil in Canada was selling for at the pumps the last time it was priced at $15 per barrel?

Senator Frith: That is a straightforward question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government. I know that for a long time the leader had an abiding interest in interest rates and the value of the Canadian dollar. My question is this: Does the government intend to take any action to re-establish a competitive fairness between Canada and some of the other countries as a result of action that was taken in the last few days? For example, the West German central bank lowered the discount rate from 4.5 per cent to 4 per cent and a similar action was taken with respect to the Swiss franc.

In view of the fact that our prime interest rate, which is the rate paid by most businesses, is now approximately 4 percentage points higher than that in the United States, as I mentioned the other day, and the spread is even wider when you look at some of the European countries, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise whether the government intends to take its responsibilities seriously and change things so that Canadian businesses can have this cost factor on a competitive basis with the other western countries?

• (1430)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I might say to my honourable friend that it would be even more to the point if he reported that in the United States the interest rate has also dropped half a point, which is far more significant from our point of view than anything else. I say to my friend that yes, we are hoping to get interest rates down. It is, of course, a matter that must be considered in connection with the stability of the Canadian dollar. Fortunately, that has been in better shape these last few days, which leads one to conclude that we may expect better things of the interest rates before long.

Senator Olson: The Honourable Leader of the Government says we can expect better things of the interest rates before long. Is that an indication that the government will take some action, or at least use its influence to reduce interest rates next Thursday when the weekly rate is announced?

Senator Roblin: No. I think that will be left to the Governor of the Bank of Canada to determine. However, the government's view is that interest rates are now much higher than we like to see them and, insofar as we can do it appropriately within our economy, we intend to do our best to get them down.

ENERGY

HEAVY OILS—CONSTRUCTION OF UPGRADER AT LLOYDMINSTER, ALBERTA—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and pertains to the upgrader at Lloydminster, Alberta.

As the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware, there was an agreement reached between Alberta, Saskatchewan, the Government of Canada and Husky Oil to provide for the construction of a $3.2 billion upgrader to utilize the heavy oils of Alberta. We now have the Minister of Transport saying that the government will honour that agreement. At the same time, we have the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources saying she is not certain that it will be honoured, and we have the Minister of Finance stating in Calgary recently that the agreement will have to be renegotiated. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate might indicate who is stating policy on behalf of this divided government? If not, would he indicate in his own terms the policy of the government with respect to that agreement negotiated to construct that upgrading facility at Lloydminster.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): As the Premier of Alberta announced quite recently, that problem is now being discussed between the governments concerned.

Senator Hastings: Is the Premier of Alberta now announcing policy on behalf of the Government of Canada?

Senator Roblin: No, he is not, but it is quite in order for him to say that he is talking to the Government of Canada.

Senator Olson: What is the government's response?

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Hon. Arthur Tremblay, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, presented the following report.

Tuesday, March 11, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-55, intituled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976", has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 5, 1986, examined the said Bill and now reports the same without amendment.

Respectfully submitted,

ARTHUR TREMBLAY
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators when shall this bill be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, in connection with the report on Bill C-55, when I spoke on second reading, I made certain suggestions and I asked a couple of questions of Senator Barootes who presented the bill. I am just wondering whether Senator Barootes will reply to the questions I have raised when we debate the bill on third reading.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, some suggestions were made by Senator Bosa in his very cogent contribution to the debate on Bill C-55. The honourable senator was good enough to discuss the matter with me subsequently and requested that those suggestions be passed on to the minister of the department, inasmuch as the strong suggestions that he had made did not relate particularly to Bill C-55 but rather to a major revision of the Immigration Act, 1976.

In compliance with his request, I sent a letter to the department notifying them of the senator's suggestions and I think a copy was forwarded to Senator Bosa for his attention. I hope you have received it, sir.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, in asking Senator Barootes to inform the minister of my suggestions, I was hoping that the minister would make a commitment to include those suggested amendments when the next revision of the immigration policy is done on a more comprehensive basis.

On motion of Senator Barootes, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which was presented on Wednesday, March 5, 1986.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, the report of the committee was printed in the Debates of the Senate and in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and has been before the Senate for a few days now.

For those senators who are members of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders or of the Internal Economy Committee, no further explanation is required. However, for those senators who are not members of those two committees, possibly a few brief comments would be useful.

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders studied this matter at the request of the Internal Economy Committee because of problems that arose when requests were made in the Senate for the establishment of either a special committee or for a special study by standing committee. The problem that the Senate was faced with was this; while honourable senators might think the purpose of the study was worth while, there was no idea of the cost of the study. Frequently, the Senate would agree to the request, and then the committee was structured. The committee chairman would then appear before the Internal Economy Committee requesting a budget, and the Internal Economy Committee was faced with a situation in which the Senate had approved the study, technically approving the expenditure of moneys for that study, but not knowing in fact what the cost was going to be. The Internal Economy Committee had its hands, in a certain way, tied—not totally, perhaps. Nevertheless there was an order from the Senate authorizing a committee to undertake a study, and thereby authorizing the expenditure of moneys, so what was Internal Economy Committee to do?

What we have tried to do is to establish a standard procedure whereby the Senate will remain the dominant body and will make the final decisions. This procedure will ensure that the Senate can make those decisions in full knowledge of the financial implications.

So, the committee approached the problem in this way; first of all, by dealing with the standing committees insofar as their regular work—that is, their work related to the study of bills, the study of the subject matter of bills and the study of estimates is concerned. This work is viewed as the normal activity of standing committees of the Senate. At the outset of a session, each committee establishes what its projected budget might be, and the chairman goes before the Internal Economy Committee and gets the budget approved. If there are additional expenditures required during the year for the standard work of a Senate committee, the chairman of that committee can, of course, go back to the Internal Economy Committee to obtain additional funds.

What we refer to in the guidelines as section 100 deals strictly with the regular, day-to-day work of our committees. The Internal Economy Committee deals with those budgets and then comes back to the Senate. We propose one change from the previous practice, and that is that when a report with a budget consideration for a standing committee is presented in the Senate, the chairman of the committee would move the adoption of the report, which would mean that it would be debatable. In the past, those reports have not been debatable, and it was felt that this should not be the case, that the Senate should remain the final body, and that there should be an opportunity to debate the amounts of those budgets, if so desired.

Let us go now to the second section. Section 200 of the guidelines deals with any work relative to special studies, whether undertaken by a standing committee or by a special committee. The procedure here would be that any honourable senator who believed that there should be a special study on a subject would move a motion in the Senate, as has been the practice in the past, and that motion would outline the purpose of the study and how long it was expected the study would take. There would be no costs mentioned in that particular motion. The reason we believe that that procedure is proper is that at that stage, particularly if it involves the setting up of a special committee, there is no way of knowing what the costs are going to be because the committee does not exist. Even if it is a special study by a standing committee, the standing committee at that point has not discussed the subject matter because the Senate has not approved the discussion of it, so the members of that committee have had no means of establishing a budget. At that point there would be a discussion in principle: "Is that particular study a worthwhile project for the Senate to undertake?" If the Senate felt that that was a worthwhile procedure, then it would approve the establishment of the committee.

Let us take a specific example. We have before us now a motion by the Honourable Senator Kelly to establish a special Senate committee on terrorism. In accordance with normal practice, we would debate in the Senate whether or not we considered it is wise to conduct a study on terrorism, and would ask Senator Kelly how long he felt it would take to complete the work.

If the Senate felt that this was a worthwhile subject, it would either establish a special committee or it would refer the matter to one of the standing committees.

The members of that committee—whatever it was called—would then sit down and determine what they wanted to do about that study and whether the study involved any expense. We must remember that many of our studies entail no extra expense. We have just completed such a study on herbicide pricing. That was a special study undertaken by the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. It was done completely in-house. The Senate had to pass a motion to have that study undertaken because it was a special study and not did come under the normal activities of the standing committee. The standing committee did not request a budget because the members of the committee did not intend to travel, they did not intend to hire any special staff and they felt that no additional costs were involved. They simply conducted the study internally.

I can cite as another example a recent study conducted by the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications on the transport of dangerous goods. No budget was required for that study, yet the work was done.

However, if the members of the special committee or the standing committee decided that they required a budget, then they would have to prepare a budget showing the expenditures in detail for the fiscal year in which we were operating, and if the study were to go into the next fiscal year, what the total cost of the study was assumed to be. They would present that budget to the Internal Economy Committee, and the Internal Economy Committee would review it in light of all of the obligations that the Internal Economy Committee has vis-à-vis the budgeting of the Senate and would make a decision. It could approve, it could reduce, or it could oppose it completely. Whatever it decided, it would have to report that decision back to the committee chairman.

The committee chairman would then discuss the matter with the members of the committee. Let us assume that the budget was approved by the Internal Economy Committee. Presumably the committee would decide to go ahead. If the budget were reduced, the members of the committee might or might not proceed with the study. If they decided to proceed, the chairman of that committee would place a second request before the Senate for an Order of Reference. That Order of Reference would include the expenditures, and the report of the Internal Economy Committee would be attached to the motion. Then the Senate would make the final decision.

The Senate would decide, in the full knowledge of the facts, initially what the purpose was, how long the study was to last, what the financial implications were and how to treat the recommendations of the Internal Economy Committee in that regard. The Senate would have all the facts before it and could make a final decision, at that point, as to what it wished to do. So that is the gist of the report. It sets out what we considered to be the best way of retaining the final control by the Senate itself. The Senate would make the decision but in every case in full knowledge of the financial implications, having the review by the Internal Economy Committee.

● (1450)

The other items in the report, which you might call section 300, are general guidelines of an accounting nature which we felt should be put into the guidelines in total so there would be an easy reference.

It is the recommendation of the committee that we rescind our present rule 83A and substitute a short rule simply saying that:

The financial operation of Senate committees shall be governed by the procedural guidelines set out in Appendix III.

Henceforth these other guidelines would be in the appendix to the rules of the Senate. The latest printed edition of our rules does not contain the appendix as it is in the printing process. You will recall the old rule book, the bound volume, had the appendix at the back and featured a number of forms, other orders and so on. It is our recommendation that, henceforth, when the Senate agrees to a guideline or a procedure, such guideline or procedure would be included in the appendix section of the rule book for convenient reference.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think the committee has struggled manfully with a problem that has been vexing some of us for the last little while, namely the conundrum that we face when dealing with an idea for a committee in one compartment and then having to consider the question of ways and means in another. What we have heard from the committee chairman represents a considerable advance over our present systems, but I really don't know why we have not taken it to its logical conclusion—that is that the committee should have full knowledge of the implications of what it was doing when it did it. As set out in the arrangement just read to us, the Senate will be asked to decide on the principle of a special study, let us say, but will not at that time consider the cost. I am not a person who thinks that money is everything, or that cost should stand in the way of a good idea because, obviously, that would not be the right way to approach things; we have to consider matters on their merits. But I think it would be helpful if the Senate knew what it was getting into.

In the situation that has been outlined to us, the Senate will approve a principle which will then be refined to the point where we know what is intended to be done and how much it will cost. That figure is then sent to the Internal Economy Committee and from there it comes back to the Senate for approval in the final instance. The Senate is caught in the same position, in that case, as the Internal Economy Committee is caught now. When you have approved in principle to do something, it then becomes exceedingly difficult to say, "But we are not going to do it because we do not have the money or we do not like the expense." The committee is in that invidious position today, but generally it does not take that view. It simply decides to ante up. There may be a discussion and there may be a possibility of re-budgeting the project, and I'm sure that is done, but basically the die is cast.

It seems to me that the Senate will be in much the same position if its authority is sought in the final instance as proposed in the suggestion made by my honourable friend. Would it not be possible to get closer to the heart of the matter and ask those who propose special committees to do their homework? In other words, if you have a good idea that is not enough. The Senate ought to know how it is proposed to carry out that good idea and to carry out the study that is envisaged. We ask them to do it with respect to time—good enough. Why can we not ask them to do it with respect to money? We have a committees' branch of experienced people who can help any senator who has an idea he wants to promote by providing him with a pro forma budget. I do not think it would be necessary to hold the committee to the exact terms of a pro forma budget because circumstances might arise that would make some changes necessary, but it would give the Senate, in the first instance, an opportunity to study the idea and to consider the budget that is attached to it.

I really do not understand why it is not considered practical to do that. As things are, the committee must state the time they are going to take. If they have to know the time it will take to do a study and what they are going to do, then perhaps they should have some idea what it is going to cost them to do it. It seems to me we have taken half a step when we should have taken the full step. I think what the committee is suggesting is better than what we have now, but I think we could go the one step further and ask those who are proposing committees in the house not only to let us know the time they want to take, which is a reasonable suggestion, but closely married to that, what they think they want to spend. I do not think we should hold them to that because when they get going they may find that circumstances alter and we have to be reasonable. But it might be helpful if we knew what we were going to do.

There is a very practical reason why we should know that. It is because we operate on a limited budget. Our budget for committees is not elastic in any meaningful sense—it is a pretty tight budget. There are a lot of other people who are making demands on that budget—not only the special committees that have been set up, but committees that have projects that should be carried to a conclusion and that cost money, and they are going to want some share of that budget. If, however, we approve as we have on the books now, three special committees: one resulting from the splitting of the Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry Committee; then the committee on Human Rights that has been proposed; and finally the committee on terrorism which has been proposed—and I daresay we will get some more—all those committees are competing with the committees we have now for a limited budgetary allocation and limited personnel—particularly in terms of the government side of the Senate because we cannot staff all of these committees.

So it seems to me that if we are really to understand what we are doing and trying to fit our important committee work into budgetary constraints which are unavoidable, then it would be a good thing to know what the cost is before we start and not because we are going to say it is not worth it, or form a judgment of that nature—that really may be done, but it is not really an essential part of what I am talking about—but it would enable us to fit the numerous proposals we get into our budgetary limitations, having in mind the needs of the standing committees which, in my opinion, come first in this particular respect.

I am not going to oppose this resolution; I am simply going to say that it does not go far enough. I ask the committee whether they would be kind enough to consider what they could do. I am positive they have discussed this among themselves and, obviously, they have not come to the conclusion that I would like, but I really think there is room here for a reconsideration of this process so that we marry not only the subject matter and the time it is expected to take, but some idea of the cost. The point is that if we have those facts in front of us, we can then better decide which of the many important and useful things that are suggested for us we should do first. It is a question of priorities. You cannot deal with priorities unless you deal with the budgetary aspects. So I ask whether the committee might be willing to consider the point that I have made and, if they have already dealt with it, perhaps it might be re-opened because it seems to me that there is some merit in proceeding along the lines that I propose.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I was a member of that committee, and I endorsed its report. I attended quite a number of the hearings on this particular subject. I think the Leader of the Government raises a very good point. I am not sure whether we did consider that particular point. Nonetheless, I think some consideration requiring a putative committee chairman to accompany his request for a special committee with a budget would be a good thing. It would be a good thing in two ways: First, dealing with the issue raised by the Leader of the Government, we have limited resources and, therefore, it makes sense for the Senate to make that decision on the basis of whether or not it is willing to allocate those resources. Second, having had considerable experience as a chairman, before we embarked on some of our hearings which involved an examination of major government departments and, therefore, were of major proportions, we laid out a format which indicated to ourselves, if to no one else, the form the hearings would take; what witnesses we would probably hear; what sort of staff we would require; and how we would generally conduct the hearings. Over and above the idea of allocating scarce resources, I think it is worth while if committee chairmen think through exactly how they will conduct the hearings in the first place.

When Senator Kelly raised the issue of a special committee on terrorism, one of the comments I heard was, "Well, what is he going to do? Is he going to travel around to every Canadian embassy in the world and check them out? Is he going to talk to experts in other countries about terrorism? What sort of witnesses does he want to call? How wide, how narrow and how focused are the hearings going to be?" I think it would have been useful to Senator Kelly's case in establishing the need for that committee if he had been able to lay out how he wanted to conduct the hearings and also what amounts of money would be involved.

I agree that it would be unwise to ask a chairman to indicate precisely how much he or she is proposing to spend, but, I repeat, after having conducted many hearings, it is possible to estimate reasonably what you would expend. It is possible to lay out the method of hearings and how you will conduct them.

While I did not consider it—perhaps the committee did, and perhaps the chairman can add to it—I am impressed by the argument that, in granting general authority, the Senate should, before it does so, have that kind of information.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

[Senator Everett.]

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I rise to speak today on the motion of my colleague, Senator Kelly, for the appointment of a special Senate committee to examine, consider and make recommendations on problems and issues relating directly or indirectly to terrorist activity either in Canada or directed at Canadians.

I will deal specifically with some of the matters set out in the motion and the recommendations to the Government of Canada on policy. The motion is framed, in my view, in such a way as to imply that the government does not have any policy or that there is not in place some mechanism for anti-terrorist activity. Surely, as one reads the motion and the comments of my friend and colleague, one is led to that conclusion.

After listening to my honourable friends for the last 15 minutes in this chamber, I do not hesitate to say that the question of a budget and any financial implications arising out of the establishment of a special committee are matters that I would much rather leave to those charged with the duty of overseeing the administration of this place and its committees. I would join with Senator Kelly and, as I recall, Senator Hicks in saying that, if the Senate found it necessary to establish such a committee to fulfill its function, it would or should find the dollars to do so. I would not disagree with that.

I will, however, address myself today solely to the question: Is the committee necessary?

It was in the summer of 1983 that the government of the day, concerned that a para-military national police force was not an adequate way to deal with intelligence gathering—and in the 1980s intelligence gathering was of such a sophisticated level—decided that consideration ought to be given to the establishment of a separate, independent security and intelligence service.

After the introduction of a controversial bill in the House of Commons, the matter was referred to a special Senate committee headed by our colleague, Senator Michael Pitfield. I should like to remind all honourable senators—and, in particular, Senator Kelly—that the overwhelming evidence before that committee was in favour of the establishment of such a separate intelligence gathering agency. Senator Frith, in his comments several weeks ago on this particular motion, referred to the fact that the establishment of this committee would lead to reworking the work of what we called "the Pitfield committee."

In fairness, I should like to say that we are all rather non-partisan on this issue, as I think we were then. My recollection is that the bill itself was a rather courageous move, because I think there were no political kudos to be won in terms of the removal of one part of the RCMP. The government of that day moved in that direction because it felt it was necessary to do so.

The proposals of the Pitfield committee were supported by Senator Flynn, Senator Balfour and myself. It is interesting to note that the establishment of a special, separate agency was opposed by Senator Kelly; that is, he disagreed with the committee report.

Senator Murray: He was not alone.

Senator Nurgitz: No, he was not alone, but, luckily, other members of our committee were not of that view; we arranged for that.

Senator Frith: He is only alone in opposing and then moving this motion.

Senator Nurgitz: I want to be fair to Senator Kelly. He was not against the gathering of necessary intelligence; he was against allowing subversive groups or terrorist groups to operate; but his view was that the status quo should remain and intelligence gathering was a function well handled by the RCMP.

I am sure that all honourable senators join Senator Kelly in holding in abhorrence these various incidents of terrorism and violence. I am sure, as well, that we all agree that governments must have a policy and must have a plan in the event that their country or their citizens are the next target.

Senator Kelly's statement that Canadians are not immune is, indeed, correct. In fact, as he has so ably pointed out, we have already had several instances where Canadians were, indeed, victims. There was the incident concerning the Leonard family in Alberta, and instances where foreign diplomats on Canadian soil were victims. I would also refer to the Turkish diplomat who was killed, and some other problems with foreign embassy people in this very city.

Honourable senators, the problem I have is that the main thrust of Senator Kelly's motion is that there is no policy to deal with this dread disease of the 1980s known as terrorism.

Coincidental to my comments today is the fact that yesterday the Solicitor General, speaking in Toronto, talked at some length about the policy, and I should like to review some of those comments. He indicated that countries which fail to take adequate measures to defend their citizens invite terrorists to victimize them. Mr. Beatty said that Canadians must send a clear message that we are resolved to protect our own citizens and foreign diplomatic personnel in Canada.

● (1510)

The Solicitor General is the member of the government responsible for these matters and he has outlined the existing policy. Honourable senators, when I say "existing policy" I am referring to a policy not just of this government but of the previous administration—a policy that has been in place over the last few years.

Indicating that Canada has forcefully pressed and continues to press for concerted international action to combat terrorism, we have had in place for some time a consultative process with our allies within the Summit Seven and within NATO. Work also continues in the United Nations forum, where Canada recently joined others in taking appropriate measures against Libya because of its support for terrorism.

The minister also pointed out that Canada recognizes the vital role that reliable intelligence plays in preventing terrorist acts and the importance of anticipating terrorist efforts. Tribute was paid to the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and its constant monitoring of these organizations and their members here in Canada and its exchanges of information with our allies, which indicates that the CSIS quietly performs an essential function.

There is also a criminal intelligence gathering information centre within the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and that information is shared with both our intelligence service and Interpol.

There has been in place for some time, through the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, emergency response teams in centres across Canada. These teams are made up of regular force members who are on call, ready to be assembled quickly to resolve armed confrontations, including hostage takings. Canada has, over the last number of years, trained and equipped police personnel to deal with the latest techniques in explosives. This is done through the RCMP Canada Bomb Data Centre. In addition to that, there is a special threat assessment group that was formed in 1975 to advise on how to respond to the threat or use of nuclear, biological or chemical agents.

In the speech given yesterday in Toronto, Mr. Beatty said that he was also supported by a group in our police and security branch which co-ordinates the federal government counter-terrorism program. This group works closely with the appropriate federal agencies, including the RCMP, the CSIS, the Privy Council Office and the Departments of External Affairs, Transport, Employment and Immigration, National Defence and National Health and Welfare. This group also consults with the provinces to delineate the authorities and mechanisms by which to deal with terrorist acts.

These, honourable senators, are the policies that this government and previous governments have had in place for some time. While recognizing that the existing policy has done a great deal to prevent terrorist violence and to save innocent lives, yesterday there were announced additional steps that the government will be taking.

Of these several new measures, the first one announced was that pursuant to the Vienna Conventions on Diplomatic and Consular Relations, the RCMP is beefing up its manpower in terms of protecting both embassies in the National Capital region and consular offices all across the country. In addition, there will be increased mobile controls backed up by special support services to provide additional security. The announcement also indicated that the Solicitor General will work closely with the Department of Transport to improve security at all airports in Canada, while taking as much care as is possible not to inconvenience unduly the travelling public.

In response to the threat of hostage taking and all of the tragic consequences that flow from such an event, the Solicitor

General yesterday announced the creation of a permanent special emergency response team to resolve incidents beyond the capability of normal protective arrangements. This, honourable senators, I might mention, is unlike the existing teams across the country that train for part of a day every month for this special combat duty. This is a team that will train constantly and will be upgrading its techniques and equipment in terms of hostage taking. The experience in most countries has apparently been that they are far better off having one outstanding team in one location with arrangements made for the military to move that one, highly specialized team into any area of the country, the assumption being, I take it, that they are hours by aircraft from one point in the country to another.

An interesting point was raised by Senator Kelly in his comments upon the role of the media in reporting terrorist incidents. This has certainly been dealt with on other occasions in this chamber, and I am speaking specifically of the motion of Senator Olson some months ago respecting the tragic death of Mrs. Edward Leonard and her small child. At that time, several senators—I recall Senator Frith and Senator Haidasz in particular—discussed this delicate balance that we somehow fail to find between the public's right to know and the terrorists' goal of international media publicity. That, indeed, is a serious problem. It seems to be a very difficult question and I do not know how one would resolve it. I note that, yesterday, Mr. Beatty announced that he would be meeting with leading members of the media in an effort to discuss that very question.

Having said all of this, I have concluded that there is a policy and a plan in place and that, by and large for Canada and Canadians, it has had some measure of success. I urge all honourable senators, as I urge Senator Kelly, in reconsidering his motion, to allow this policy and plan to go forward and not to form a committee of second guessers. I envisage, as well, the problem that would arise in reviewing such a matter. For example, I do not know how we would discuss in committee details regarding intelligence information. To reveal that sort of sensitive information could be playing into the hands of those against whom we are trying to place counter-measures. The previous administration had in place what appears to be a reasonable policy. With changing events, it is being strengthened. I suspect that in future years as other potential dangers arise it will be yet further strengthened. Because of that, I regret to say that I find no reason for our embarking upon the study of such matters. I would like to close my comments by quoting from the speech made by the Solicitor General yesterday in Toronto.

We have taken, and will continue to take, firm measures to deal with threats against Canada. There can be no guarantees when dealing with professional, highly-trained and well-financed political terrorists. But we will, as much as any democratic government can, protect ourselves from those who rationalize killing and destruction of the innocent for political ends.

Honourable senators, I appreciate that words, of themselves, will not provide the security that we need for our country.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

However, it appears to me that, when one reviews the policy as we have done during the course of the Pitfield committee hearings, one would agree that this policy ought to go forward and that this is not an appropriate time to proceed with Senator Kelly's motion. I will not support it and I urge other honourable senators not to do so.

On motion of Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES—PROPRIETY OF COMMONS REFERRALS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns, I should like to raise a point of order which will require a ruling from His Honour the Speaker. It is not a matter of any great dramatic importance, but is something that I believe should be clarified.

On February 27 the House of Commons referred two items to standing joint committees. The first was Privy Council Vote 15 which was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, and the second was Parliament Vote 10 which was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Parliament.

In the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate for Tuesday, March 4, 1986, we were advised that a message had been received from the House of Commons concerning those two items. At the time I asked whether it was possible, correct and orderly for the House of Commons to refer something to a joint committee and simply to advise us that it had done so. I asked whether it might not be a better procedure for the House to advise that it had done so, and ask us to concur in that reference.

In order to clarify the record, and not to let this matter pass with that question mark attached to it, I would now ask His Honour the Speaker to let us know the proper procedure. No doubt he will want to take it under advisement.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, we discussed this a year or two ago. There was some difference of opinion, and I reached the conclusion that although it was certainly advisable that both houses should concur, either house still had the power, based on precedents, to refer a matter to a joint committee. I can recall that the Post Office Bill was referred by the House of Commons to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments without asking for concurrence from the Senate. I merely wish to point that out so that when His Honour is considering the matter he can look up the previous discussions relating to this matter.

Senator Frith: I did not mean to deny other honourable senators the opportunity to discuss this matter. However, we can always discuss it further when we have received His Honour's ruling.

Senator Godfrey: With respect to the motions passed by this house concerning enabling clauses of bills being referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, we are still waiting patiently for action by the House of Commons, hoping that it will concur; but I have taken the attitude that if it doesn't, then the committee can go ahead with the reference of the Senate alone.

Senator Frith: I merely raise the point.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If there are no further comments, I will take this matter under advisement and will give my ruling later this week.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Wednesday, March 12, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m. the Honourable Rhéal Bélisle, the Acting Speaker, in the Chair.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—AGENDA

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, while we are close to the Ides of March, there is another date that we have learned to be careful about, and that is March 17. I am wondering if the Leader of the Government in this chamber can tell us what is on the agenda for the meeting between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should tell my honourable friend that my mother-in-law's name is Higgins, so I am conscious of the importance of the date to which he refers. With respect to the meeting between the Prime Minister and the President, it is not customary to announce the agenda in advance. We have to wait until the meeting takes place. Then information as to what subjects are on the agenda is provided.

Senator Frith: Does your mother-in-law know? Perhaps the question should be directed through you to your mother-in-law.

Senator Flynn: My great grandfather was Irish.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, if the matter of the actual agenda has not been settled, I wonder if the leader could indicate what areas of public concern might be discussed.

Senator Roblin: I shall have to wait for a statement from the Prime Minister in that respect. I cannot answer the question today.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could advise us if the matter of an import duty of some kind on crude oil is on the agenda. There has been a great deal of discussion about this by a number of governors and, indeed, President Reagan has commented on the question as to whether or not he would support an import levy, tax or whatever on crude oil. If such a duty is to be effective, it will have ramifications for both Mexico and Canada. May we know whether the President and the Prime Minister will discuss this matter?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am sorry, but I do not know what items the President of the United States will place on the agenda.

Senator Olson: Does the leader know what the Prime Minister of Canada will place on the agenda?

Senator Roblin: I have already given the answer to that question.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I understand that the Leader of the Government does not know what is on the agenda. I ask him to ask the Prime Minister to put on the agenda the plight of the agricultural industry in eastern Canada with particular reference to the potato industry, which is now in a state of crisis, and the fishing industry to the extent that it is subject to tariffs imposed by the United States. I ask the Leader to ask the Prime Minister to consider putting these two important items on the agenda to get first hand information from the President of the United States in order that we may solve these two very important problems in Eastern Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I can tell my honourable friend that both these items have been on the agenda for the past little while in the discussions between the Secretary of State of the United States, Mr. Shultz, and the Secretary of State for External Affairs of Canada. They are very important items as far as Canadians are concerned, and they have been canvassed with the Secretary of State in the United States. Whether or not it is possible to promote these issues to the presidential and prime ministerial level, I do not know, but I have no problem with saying that I will do what I can about it.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell me if the Minister of Agriculture has yet come up with any support program for the potato industry in Atlantic Canada and, in fact, all of Canada? The farmers are in a crisis situation. In Prince Edward Island, they are receiving two cents per pound for their potatoes from the provincial government and they are burying them; they are dyeing them so that they cannot be used again; they are using them for feed. Is there any program coming from Mr. Wise, the Minister of Agriculture, to aid these potato farmers?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my friend that the problem has not escaped his notice. It is under consideration by the Department of Agriculture, but as yet there is no decision on which I can give my honourable friend any information.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a bag of Prince Edward Island potatoes here worth ten cents. They are first grade potatoes and, in Prince Edward Island, they are burying them. These cost the farmers six cents per pound to grow and this five-pound bag is worth ten cents.

I am giving these potatoes to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to pass on to Mr. Wise, and tell him that it is a shame, with the hungry people in this country, that these potatoes should be going to waste.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: Let the record show that the Leader of the Government is not accepting the potatoes. Shame; he will not even take them.

Senator Roblin: I am very relaxed about my honourable friend. I know the kind of thing that he gets up to from time to time. I simply tell him that while the potatoes have not been delivered to me, I am sure that someone can make good use of them for St. Patrick's Day and I will see that that happens.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if the honourable leader will not accept Prince Edward Island potatoes, will he accept a ten-pound bag of New Brunswick potatoes?

Senator Guay: What about Manitoba potatoes?

Senator Flynn: I think you like that kind of show.

Senator Roblin: I think that members can do what they like in this house, and that applies also to me. I do not feel—

Senator Flynn: You know that it is contrary to the rules. You have known that for a long time.

Senator Roblin: There are certain privileges in the Senate which I think should not be breached. If my honourable friend wishes to conduct himself in that way, it is all right with me.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, if I have offended the Leader of the Government in any way, I apologize. However, I am very much surprised that the former Leader of the Opposition and former Leader of the Government in the Senate is still trying to tell the new leader how to run things in this house.

Senator Flynn: I am still concerned with order in this chamber. I do not think you can teach me anything.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn still thinks he is the Minister of Justice; he still thinks he is the leader of that party in this place; he still thinks he is running the show and he is still shooting off his mouth! In addition, he is still trying to tell me what to do. Honourable senators, I have apologized to the Leader of the Government in case I have insulted him. However, I do want this chamber to realize that the potato farmers of Prince Edward Island are faced with a serious problem and that the people of Canada are faced with a serious problem. I had no malice aforethought, but I do wish that the former Minister of Justice and the former leader of the Conservative Party in this house would stick to his seat. When I speak to him, then he can speak to me.

Senator Roblin: I must say that, as leader of the house, I defend the right of any senator, regardless of where he sits, to rise on a point of order and to express his opinion if he thinks that the rights and privileges of the Senate have been breached. I see nothing wrong with that. I think it is a reasonable thing to expect senators to do and I think my honourable friend's strictures are misplaced.

● (1410)

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has made a habit of trying to run everything—speeches included—in this house for a long time now. The fact of the matter is that every other senator has exactly the same rights and privileges on the floor of this house as he does, and we do not have to adjust our speeches or our other activities to suit him.

I know there are some senators who may object to what the Honourable Senator Bonnell has done, but some of us are rather tired of constantly having Senator Flynn trying to run this house according to his interpretation of what the rules are. His interpretation is no more valid than anyone else's.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I have never claimed that my interpretation is more valid than anyone else's; I have never prevented my honourable friend from rising on a point of order.

What the Leader of the Government has said, and what Senator Olson has repeated himself—I do not know if he realizes that he did so—was that any senator has the right to rise on a point of order, and I did so because of the manner in which Senator Bonnell put his question and by wanting this bag of potatoes circulated. I think that is improper, and I have a perfect right to say so.

I am not trying to run you; that would be excessive and presumptuous on my part. In any event, I do not care what you do. You can do what you wish.

Senator Olson: I must abide by the rules of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I am only thinking of the Senate, and sometimes when I see the way some senators behave, I think it shows contempt for the dignity of the Senate.

Senator Guay: Speaking about yourself!

Senator Robichaud: It's all right.

YOUTH

KATIMAVIK—CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in putting my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate I preface it by saying that we are all aware—as I think the public is—that political parties hold their national caucus meetings every Wednesday morning. It has not escaped public attention that one of our esteemed colleagues, Senator Jacques Hébert, is doing his best to prove a point, and that point is that the government—unilaterally, without discussion, without any option for negotiation or compromise—informed him that it was putting an end to the Katimavik program.

Since the parties held their caucus meetings this morning—and I am not asking the government house leader to spell out the secrets of caucus—could he indicate one way or another, while respecting the secrecy of caucus, if the matter of concern to Senator Jacques Hébert, to the members of the Youth Committee, and to all of the youth of Canada was taken under advisement? Is the government disposed, in principle, to reviewing this decision of the Secretary of State?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, though I am not the government house leader, I presume the question was addressed to me, so I will do my best to answer it.

My friend has asked me to square the circle by telling him what went on in caucus by not telling him what went on in caucus. Of course, that is an impossibility.

I remark on the fact, as I did yesterday, that on February 19 Senator Hébert tabled the report of his committee in the Senate and moved “that it be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.” That motion was never proceeded with. I do not know why it was never proceeded with; I think it ought to have been, because the very first place to discuss that report is on the floor of the Senate. It is not a report of the Senate; it is a report of a committee of the Senate. We must determine what the Senate thinks about it, and in order to do so we must have a debate on it.

That motion is still before the Senate, and I do not know why Senator Hébert has thought fit not to proceed with it. That is curious, but I think some arrangement should be made, as I said yesterday, to proceed with a debate on this report, because, until the Senate has expressed its view, I do not think we are in a position to ask the government for its views, although I must confess that the government is taking the report under serious consideration.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: My answer is that—

Senator Flynn: It's not a question!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Hébert: My answer to this is: First of all I did my duty, as chairman of this Special Committee on Youth, by touring the country and working almost day and night to promote it through the media during three full weeks. I could not be in the Senate making speeches while I was doing this part of my job, which was to promote the report across the country. I was interviewed by almost 150 media people across the country, so people know about this report. You are quite right, the time has come to ask the Senate to debate it, but could I have done without the work that I finished last Friday in Fredericton? I could not do any better. I would like to know what your answer to this explanation is.

Senator Roblin: I think I should remind my honourable friend that in his letter to the Prime Minister he stated that he had exhausted all the regular democratic processes. Well, I do not think he has. If he does not consider debating the issue in the Senate worth while, no matter what his reasons may be for not having proceeded so far, I do not think his position holds true. I think the Senate has a right to have its committee report discussed here, and I think members and chairmen of committees who make reports ought to see that that is done. That is my friend's responsibility, regardless of any other activity he might have.

Senator Hébert: Well, first of all I have already described that I was three weeks on the road, working day and night. Now I am back, and tomorrow I will start a debate, as was planned. Is that good enough?

Senator Roblin: Yes, that is good enough. That suits me very well. I think it is an appropriate move for my friend to make and I trust we shall have a vigorous and enlightening debate on the subject.

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Would he be kind enough to tell me if Senator Hébert has ever gone on any of these, shall I say “displays”, or anything of that nature, either inside or outside of the Senate, when coal mines were closed down on Cape Breton Island under Conservative and Liberal governments, or was it not important enough that hundreds of coal miners were thrown on the street time and time again under both governments? I have never heard of his having done so, but the Leader of the Government may know something about it.

Senator Hébert: This is a question of privilege?

Senator Frith: He does not want anyone who knows about it to speak to it.

Senator Roblin: I am afraid I cannot answer the question. I will have to take it as notice.

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Hébert: I think it is a question of privilege, because if you feel that way you can be sure of one thing—I am in a fighting mood. I can answer everyone here.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Hébert: My answer to your insidious question is this: Before I was a senator I never had the privileges I enjoy now as a senator, such as being chairman of a committee that gave me the opportunity to travel across this country and to learn about the misery of our youth. It is because of this privilege that I now feel, as I guess all the other members of the Special Committee on Youth feel, that we are facing a national tragedy. That is why we used such language. After using all the other democratic means, I am obliged to go a little further by doing what I am doing. If I had known as much as I know now during the Liberal regime I would have done the same thing, but I did not know it and so I did not do it.

Senator Muir: This thing was not privilege, sir. I am one who has crawled around in the mud and dirt of the coal mines, with water running down my back. Senator Hébert has been active in public life for many years, and is a man of letters who is well qualified and has written many books and knows what has gone on in Canada. So, in response to his idiotic privilege may I say that I think coal miners are equally important as citizens of Canada, and should have had greater representation in addition to what many of us on both sides of the house tried to do under many governments, and still try to do to help them out. Not only in one instance should we go on display.

● (1420)

I am unable to understand why a man so brilliant, so qualified, and who knows what has gone on in this country for many years, has never heard of 400 or 500 coal miners—and in one case 1,200—being thrown out on the streets. Senator Hébert did not say a word about it. Where was he living? In Canada? Did he not know about it?

He was a citizen of Canada and, if he wanted to express dissatisfaction or make representations, he could have sat out in the yard or, for that matter, anywhere at all.

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, again I would not like to let an opportunity go by without putting my daily question to the Leader of the Government. Unfortunately, even if I should wish to do so, I could not try to present him with a bag of sugar-beets because southern Alberta did not grow any last year.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator Fairbairn: I would ask of the Leader of the Government in the Senate again whether he is any closer to being able to tell us the timing of any announcement on a national sugar-beet policy and stabilization payments to the sugar-beet farmers of the country.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Now, honourable senators, things are back to normal. I would have been disappointed if I had not heard from my friend, but I can tell her that I am morally certain—note the qualification—that this time tomorrow I will have information for her.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ALLEGED REMARKS BY CONSERVATIVE MP—ATTITUDE OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

The Speaker in the other place made a ruling on March 6, 1986, which is to be found at page 11261 of Commons Hansard concerning an alleged slur made by the member for Nunatsiag, Mr. Suluk, against the member for Bourassa, Mr. Rossi.

The ruling of the Speaker was to the effect that he had checked the official report and was unable to find any such remarks in the “blues” and, consequently, was not able to rule on it.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: Since that member had been heard by three other members who were willing to testify that he had made such remarks, will he or will the Prime Minister make a general statement saying that members who make such remarks are not welcome in the Conservative Party?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to say that the matter my friend raises has to do with proceedings in the House of Commons, and that is no business of ours.

Senator Bosa: I also have a supplementary question.

Honourable senators, this goes beyond the rules of the Senate and beyond the rules of the House of Commons; this has to do with fairness. I think the honourable gentleman is a really fair person. I think his party wants to be fair in its treatment of Canadians and minorities.

I think there is a cloud over his party as a result of the fact that no one in the leadership has made a statement dissociating himself from the slurs that were made and heard by people in the other place.

Senator Roblin: What my friend is really saying is that he does not believe the Speaker of the House of Commons ruled correctly. The Speaker of the House of Commons has dealt with this matter. My honourable friend may not agree with the way in which he dealt with it, but I have to concede that that gentleman is dealing with it in an honourable manner as he sees the facts. I really do not think that it is appropriate for me to seek to condemn the Speaker of the House of Commons and go behind his ruling. I do not intend to do so.

Senator Bosa: As a final supplementary, honourable senators, I am not dealing with the rules of the other place, nor am I applying any measure of quality to the kind of ruling that the Speaker made, because that has nothing to do with the question that I am putting to the Leader of the Government. The Speaker ruled on the evidence that he had at his disposal. The remarks were not reported in the “blues”. Consequently, he could not make a ruling befitting the situation.

I am asking the Leader of the Government to dissociate himself from the remarks that were made, even though they were not in the “blues”, because those remarks were heard by people in the other place who were within close proximity to the person who made them.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend wants to be the judge. He wants to say that an honourable member did something that he does not like. I repeat that he wants to be the judge and, on the basis of his decision, he wants me to do something. That is not really very sensible.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, although I said that it was my final question, the government leader invites yet another supplementary. The member in the other place never denied that he made that slur. In addition, he went beyond an attack on a minority group. He also attacked the police force of Montreal and the police forces in this country. I am not asking the honourable gentleman to point a finger at the member who allegedly made these remarks. I am asking him to make a statement of policy on behalf of the Conservative Party.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, there is absolutely no need to take the action that my honourable friend describes. He is placing his own judgment on the matter; he is asking me to take action on that and I am not going to do it.

STATUS OF WOMEN

ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL—RESTRICTION OF SPOUSES' ACTIVITIES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning the position of the government with respect to the Organizational Association of Spouses of Military Members. I have asked previously whether the government is planning to make a statement concerning the situation with which honourable senators are familiar and in which the spouses found themselves when they attempted to get a street crossing light to protect their children on the base. Has the Leader of the Government had any word on that announcement?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This problem is under review in the Department of National Defence. I expect that some statement will be made about it in due course. There is nothing that I can advise my friend of today.

ASSOCIATION OF SPOUSES OF MILITARY MEMBERS—STATUS OF GOVERNMENT GRANT

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. The same association applied for a grant from the Secretary of State women's grants program. In September they were told locally that they would not receive a grant but they were told from the national office that they would receive a grant. This matter has remained unresolved from September until now. Would the Leader of the Government be willing to add his inquiry to those that have been made outside of Parliament so as to discover the status of that grant?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend will be good enough to give the details behind her question—dates, names, places, and so forth—I will see what I can do about it.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I have been pressing him to make inquiries as to when the consumers of gasoline may expect a drop in price. Would he care to comment on a report printed in the Vancouver Sun which states that Vancouver area motorists could be paying up to 12 cents per litre less for gas by May 1, according to figures provided by the provincial energy ministry? I could go on to quote the article further, but the provincial energy ministry of British Columbia believes that producers should be getting a benefit of as much as an additional 12 cents per litre because of the current drop in oil prices. My question is: Does the Leader of the Government feel that that is a reasonable assessment? When can some of these benefits be expected by the consumer?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to tell my honourable friend that it is not my practice to deal with newspaper stories, nor, indeed, is it within the rules of the chamber that I should be expected to, so I do not. I will simply tell him that the information given him yesterday about our desire to get prices down stands. We are anxious to get them down as soon as possible.

Senator Argue: My question is this: Does the minister feel that the tremendous drop in international oil prices does warrant a drop of as much as 12 cents per litre?

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: I do not know whether it involves the question of 12 cents per litre. I do know that I believe the reduction should be very substantial.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Arthur Tremblay moved the third reading of Bill C-70, to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I should like to say a few words on third reading. I presume that Senator Tremblay, the sponsor of the bill and chairman of the committee, will himself have something to say either later today or at a later date.

I shall begin by thanking the chairman and all members of the committee for their courtesy and co-operation. I also thank those witnesses who took the time to come from points near and far to appear before the committee to give very important testimony in connection with the committee's proceedings.

It appears that we are at a crossroads with respect to social programs in this country. The de-indexation of family allowances has set off alarm bells all across the country. There is a tremendous fear that this is merely the thin edge of the wedge. It is felt that the present government has just begun what will become a continuing process of cutbacks in social spending, resulting in very serious erosion of our total package of social programs.

Over the past three weeks the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology heard what could best be described as very moving testimony from some very emotional people. Not one witness who appeared before the committee spoke in favour of the legislation.

There was a general feeling among some of the witnesses that the government had broken another promise, that we as legislators, collectively, were letting them down. They felt that we were taking something away from them that they already had or that they were entitled to, and they wondered where the axe would fall next.

During yesterday's meeting of the committee I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether or not the government had ever contemplated the restoration of full indexation, and, if so, when and under what circumstances? Mr. Epp responded by saying, "Senator, that is an interesting question and, when I have those answers from my cabinet colleagues, I will be glad to give them to you quite early."

Well, honourable senators, there are those who worry that this kind of heartless action would just pile more worry and more stress upon the stress that already existed. Some even said it was an attack against the family and was having a serious adverse effect on the morale of those who already felt downtrodden and those who were struggling to provide proper nutrition for their children, let alone to clothe them, to provide adequate shelter and to send them to school.

I do not know how to respond to that. I do not believe that the Prime Minister, if he came face to face with those people, would know how to respond. The Minister of National Health and Welfare has not been able to provide them with an adequate response. I do not know of one member of this chamber who would be able to put those terrible fears to rest. Certainly there was no one on the committee who could satisfy the legitimate concerns of people who face the problem of poverty every day of their lives.

One of the problems is that no matter what figures or charts one uses—and God knows we have enough charts and figures to fill several volumes—others will argue, using other charts and other sets of figures, that the people most affected will be worse off in the long run. In between are those victims who feel that things are tough enough and that they are going to get tougher.

Witnesses felt that they were being heard perhaps, but that we really were not listening and that the final decision had already been made, was cast in stone and could not be changed. The fact of the matter is that sometimes governments, no matter what their political stripe, do a lousy job of selling new programs and new directions. If, indeed, the present government has something better to offer down the road—and I have yet to be convinced—I only wish, as I did in the past, that they did the selling job and put in place more adequate programs, if they are to come, before they began the cuts. Again, I believe that we have a responsibility not only for the physical well-being of Canadians in need, but also for their mental attitudes. I also believe, after listening to the testimony of witnesses and interviewing many people across the country, that what we are doing will seriously affect the morale of thousands of our people.

We boast that Canada is the freest, the most bountiful, the most wonderful country with the greatest social programs in the world. There are so many reasons for us as Canadians to count our blessings. Yet, there were times, listening to the testimony in general and listening to individual mothers, that I felt ashamed. Let me quote Ms. Wendy Arbour, a single mother with two small children. She had this to say:

Come the middle of the month, I am out of milk, bread, diapers for the baby and oddments around the house. Often there is no meat left or not even any macaroni and cheese for the kids' supper.

Ms. Dena Kenny, a mother in a two-parent welfare family with four children, two teenagers and two younger children, said this:

My family allowance is important to me because, when my welfare cheque arrives at the beginning of the month, I pay my bills, buy my groceries and that is it. By the time my family allowance comes in, I owe money to the corner grocery . . . with the money I lose due to the de-indexation—

That is de-indexation of the family allowance

—one of my children will not be able to buy a bus pass to go to school. I find it very difficult to lose that money.

Ms. Regena Russell said:

I have not bought new clothes for several years. I go to a trade centre which deals in secondhand clothing. Buying new clothes for children is very unusual for women on welfare. I have never bought a new pair of shoes for my daughter.

My next quote is from Mr. Bill Bradley, who runs a soup kitchen and is the Executive Director of Shepherds of Good Hope here in Ottawa. He said:

The other day we served almost 300 meals to poor people who came to us for help . . . what we deal with are those people who have come down the ladder of economic life until they reached the point where they have nowhere else to turn.

I can tell you from experience that when the government decides to cut we have to pay. Somebody has to feed those people, and if we are not feeding them they will simply go hungry. We commonly run into people, particularly young people, who have not eaten for three or four days.

. . . for the families we deal with, a 50-cent decision is often a very important decision.

He talked of one family of five children and of which the father is unable to work because of a disability. Mr. Bradley related how the man relies on the annual Child Tax Credit cheque. He said:

—he begins saying in January to his creditors 'Can you wait until my cheque comes in?' In January . . . his furnace broke down. He had to ask the furnace man who came to fix his furnace, 'Do you mind if I pay you when I get the tax cheque?'

Later on, he said:

If we start eroding these cheques, people like this man will start phoning me or the parish—

Farther on, he said:

The welfare system is the safety net. We have become the safety net under the safety net, and this situation is growing . . . there are more people on welfare in this city [Ottawa] now than there have ever been—10,400 individuals—and that number is growing.

Mr. Bradley also said that Ottawa was one of the better places in the country, that there are many worse off places. I can tell honourable senators that I agree with that comment from personal experience in my own part of the country. He went on to say:

We are having a lot of difficulties now with youngsters. They are coming out of homes at 16 years of age where the family has said . . . 'we cannot feed you any more. You have to go out and fend for yourself.' They come to us often times in tears because they do not know how to make their way in life . . . their anger begins to grow.

For a young person at this stage of their life with no education and no skills, their future looks very bleak. Recently, we had one young boy commit suicide, and two brothers who tried to commit suicide together. They could see nothing worth living for any more.

Mr. Michael McBane of the Social Affairs Office of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops had this to say:

—we are seeing humanity not being sure about the future to the extent that even procreation is being called into question. These kinds of measures to undercut the basic security and needs of families contribute to that crisis of the future.

Miss Christine Hayden, Chairperson of the East London United Church Outreach Cluster, and representative of the National Working Group on Economy and Poverty of the United Church of Canada had this to say:

Statistics are indifferent to human pain and cannot effectively convey a true picture of the daily struggle that poor Canadians engage in, as parents—and often single mothers—endeavouring to feed their children.

With a growth from 12 to 14 per cent in the number of poor families in Canada (between 1981 and 1983), with an estimated 1.2 million Canadian children (20 per cent of our children) living in poverty, this Bill is not even a lump of coal, it is a slap in the face to a hungry family.

Monsignor Adolph Proulx, Bishop of Hull, said:

Society must not succumb to an ideology of restraint that subordinates human dignity and human needs to abstract economic theory.

Instead, he said:

—at a time when families face grave economic threats, priority must be given to preserving and indeed improving our social programs.

Quoting from the report of the Canadian Mental Health Association on Unemployment, Bishop Proulx said:

The report documents the fact that with the rising rate of unemployment there are increases in rates of depression, anxiety, youth alienation, children's problems in school and poverty induced consequences such as poor nutrition and inadequate housing. Other devastating effects include family violence, suicide, homicides and rapes, divorce, drug abuse and premature deaths.

As a pastor, he notes:

We do not believe that we are over-dramatizing this situation by saying that the socio-economic crisis in this country may be creating the conditions of social breakdown.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, according to the budget papers of May 23, 1985, the partial de-indexing of family allowance payments is expected to save the government $15 million in fiscal 1985-86 and $40 million in 1986-87. I respectfully suggest that these savings, when compared to the total federal deficit of over $30 billion, and measured against crying human needs, are really insignificant. The indexation of the family allowance has not been a burden for Canada. With decreasing birth rates, the total cost of this program now accounts for less than 1 per cent of the gross national product. As Ms. Gibson of the Vancouver Status of Women observed:

Twenty years ago . . . the Family Allowance payments represented 6.1% of the total federal expenditures, and . . . this figure has dropped to 2.4%.

Mr. Terrence Huntley, the Executive Director of the Canadian Council on Social Development, states:

Of the $228 million to be saved, roughly through de-indexing by 1990, about $172 million or 75% of the amount will come from families with below average incomes.

Other government expenditures could have been reduced or even frozen to achieve the same level of savings. For instance, defence expenditures for 1985-86 will increase by 7 per cent to $9.4 billion. A 0.6 per cent reduction in defence expenditures for 1985-86 would have been enough to cover the full indexation of family allowance payments for the next two fiscal years.

The implication is quite clear. Before expenditures on the needy are cut back, I suggest the government should, at the very least, avoid increasing its spendings on items that clearly benefit the well-to-do taxpayers of Canada. Honourable senators, I could go through the long list which has been recited time and time again about capital gains exemptions and so on, but I do not wish to bore you again with those items.

Other budget measures introduced in May 1985 and in February 1986 could further exacerbate the plight of middle and low income Canadians. These include the 3 per cent surtax on federal income tax, increases in the federal sales tax and hidden taxes down the road. Honourable senators, since low and middle income families spend all or most of their discretionary income on consumer goods, the sales tax increase further reduces their purchasing power. Along with the proposed changes in the income tax system, the burden on lower and middle income Canadians is increased. This suggests that, in spite of increases in the child tax credit, the overall impact of the last two budgets is clearly to make low income families worse off.

The decision to have children is one which most parents take after very careful consideration. Most families today are choosing to limit the number of children to typically one or two per family. From information gathered by Statistics Canada, it is evident that there is a progressive decline in the number of children being born in Canada. For instance, in 1961 the zero to 17-year age group of our population was a total of 7,095,536, or 38.9 per cent of the total population. By 1971 this same age group was 7,695,813, or 36.7 per cent; by 1981 this group was down to 6,845,138, or 28.1 per cent; and what was most striking for me, honourable senators, was that by 1983 the zero to 17-year age group decreased to 6,663,000, or 26.8 per cent of our population. That, to me, is a startling decline. In one generation, the percentage of children in our society had declined from almost 39 per cent of our population to nearly 25 per cent.

We also know that during this same period—and this is very important to note—those over 65 years of age increased from 1,391,154 in 1961 to 2,496,500. That represents a 55.7 per cent increase in one generation.

We have heard the explanation that changes to child tax credit, child tax exemption and family allowances are being undertaken so that we do not mortgage the future of our youth. Not once have I heard the question raised as to whether there will be sufficient numbers of children to ensure that the future for Canada as we know it, and as our mothers and fathers, grandmothers and grandfathers worked and fought to create, will even exist.

I believe that we are facing a serious crisis in our society. The crisis, as I view it, is not one of diminished fiscal resources, but one of reducing the quality of human resources. If the state persists in turning its back on families raising children, families who have undertaken this special role for our society, how will our future generations respond?

Honourable senators, I believe that now is the time for this chamber to meet a challenge which, to my knowledge, has not yet been addressed in this country, and if it has it has only been done on a piecemeal basis. Families in Canada today are facing significant changes. We cannot avoid dealing with the changing structure of families, the transformation of the roles of men and women in families, the problems of violence in families, the economic well-being of families, the changing work and parental roles, adequate housing for families, the relationship between the education system and families, the relationship between recreation, culture and families, daycare services, social services and social benefits for families, and the law and families. The list, of course, is far from complete, but the need for such an undertaking is, I suggest, critical.

Honourable senators, I propose that the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology seriously consider putting in place a process which would produce concrete proposals for meeting the needs of families today, to the year 2000 and beyond. However, I believe that we should set target dates in this respect. We should begin to develop practical solutions for those people who have the responsibility for designing policies, developing programs and providing services to families directly. It may be that the committee should take on the role of a major task force charged with a solid mandate to develop a concrete plan of action which would lead to the implementation of new and comprehensive policies, programs and services affecting families. Such an effort should be characterized, I suggest, not only by the recommendations of professionals, but even more essentially by the testimony of ordinary Canadians who speak from first-hand experience. The recipients of the more meaningful recommendations to be developed should include federal, provincial and municipal governments; business and labour; those involved in housing, recreation, culture and education; public services, professional groups and community groups. It is to be hoped that the beneficiaries in the long run will be families, especially those who are most in need.

Let me conclude by saying again that there is a great deal of uncertainty, a great deal of confusion and a great deal of frustration out there. A great deal of good has been accomplished, but there is a great deal more which can be accomplished in the future.

I am reminded, honourable senators, of a very touching and very valid slogan I heard when visiting the Philippines recently. This slogan was adopted by the National Movement for Free Elections, commonly known as Namfrel, and I quote: "It is better to light a candle than to curse the dark."

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the third reading of Bill C-55, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I had been wondering whether the Honourable Senator Barootes was going to speak to the bill on third reading. Since it appears now that Senator Barootes is not going to speak, I should like to make a few remarks myself.

Honourable Senators, Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition opposes this bill not because it has anything against any particular aspects of the bill, but because it believes that it is a band-aid approach to a problem which requires major surgery. The government recognized that. The government went on record to say that the next time it introduces a round of amendments, they will be more comprehensive and will deal with the matter of refugees in a more extensive manner. They will also include some of the recommendations contained in Rabbi Plaut's report, as well as some of the recommendations made by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

For us, this is the last opportunity to ask questions with respect to future amendments. I am not going to deal with the matter of refugees, but I should like, however, to ask the honourable gentleman the same question I put to him on second reading, which was: When the new round of amendments are presented, will those amendments also contain an amendment to the objective of the policy? The objective of Canada's immigration policy now reads:

—to enrich and strengthen the Cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal and bilingual character of Canada.

When this measure was passed in 1976, several people from across the country wanted to include in the definition of the objectives the word "multiculturalism". They suggested it should read as follows:

—taking into account the federal bilingual and multicultural character of Canada.

When an amendment to that effect was moved at that time in the other place, the Conservative members supported it. They wanted to have the word "multiculturalism" included in the objectives of the policy.

So, I am asking the honourable senator now to give us an undertaking that when the new round of amendments is introduced by the government this particular amendment will be included.

Senator Flynn: Or delete any reference to it.

Senator Bosa: This is not a controversial issue; it is not a contentious issue, because we support it and the honourable members opposite support it. Therefore, it is a very easy thing for Senator Barootes to say: "I am going to get in touch with the minister and I will ask the minister to include an amendment to the objectives of the Immigration Act, 1978" which will provide for that. If we have an undertaking from Senator Barootes that he will do that, we can give this bill third reading as soon as he is in a position to say that he has received a commitment from the minister to that effect.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Bosa for speaking on this matter today. He did, as honourable senators are aware, refer to this in his major address a few days ago.

I should like to point out that when he refers to these amendments as being "band-aids", they are perhaps better described as being "temporary". They are a matter of temporary adjustment to the Immigration Act, 1976. This is a temporary adjustment in order to allow the enormous backlog of cases to proceed, and to eliminate the hardship and suffering of many Canadian permanent and immigrant families.

It is admitted by the minister, and it is admitted by those in charge of this legislation, that it is a temporary measure and will be in place until the Immigration Act, 1976 can be seriously overhauled with major amendments conforming to many of the things the honourable senator has spoken about, as well as amendments conforming to the wisdom of that great scholar, Rabbi Plaut, and the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in respect of the "Singh" case, which was heard in April of this year, I believe.

To do that will take some time. In the meantime, the hardship which people and families are undergoing must be dealt with, and this is a temporary measure to deal with that.

I would parenthetically wish to point out to the honourable senator that these amendments in Bill C-55 were under consideration by the former administration. So, we have been waiting two and a half to three years for some amelioration of this hardship.

Insofar as the objectives of the act are concerned, they are not contained in nor are they amended by Bill C-55. We will have to wait until a major overhaul of the act is under way to amend these objectives. I can assure the honourable senator, as I can assure all honourable senators, that I have written to the minister and to his department in respect of his wish. I have conveyed that wish as strongly as I could, together with the remarks the honourable senator made in the chamber a few days ago. I have not received a reply to that letter. I do hope the honourable senator has received a copy of that letter because I did ask that it be sent along to him.

The honourable senator told me that in 1975-76, when this measure was being proposed, the Conservative Party, then in opposition, supported the insertion of a minor addition to the objectives so that it would read:

—the federal bilingual and multicultural character of Canada.

I understand that that insertion was not made at that time. This suggestion has been conveyed to the minister so that it might be included in the major redrafting that will take place in the future.

I wish I could give the honourable senator my undertaking that this will be done, but unfortunately we in this house, and I in particular, do not have the power to write that legislation; that legislation will be written by the department. That legislation will be written in the department and I am sure they will take this change in the objective into consideration. I wish I could give you all the assurance that you need, but there is no way that I, in my helpless condition as a senator in this situation, can.

• (1510)

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like to put a question to the honourable gentleman. I have no doubt that he would support this amendment, but I am asking him to elicit a response from the minister. I know that he sent a letter to him outlining the suggestions that were made on second reading and that he brought to the minister's attention the concerns we expressed. There is no controversy concerning the rest of the bill. We realize that there is an emergency here that needs to be dealt with as quickly as possible. We are asking him to call the minister—I am sure he is able to communicate with the minister without difficulty—and elicit a response from the minister that we hope will say that whoever is going to present those amendments will include this particular minor amendment to the objectives of the policy in the future.

Senator Barootes: I shall be pleased to convey your wish to the minister and then transmit to you his assurances at the earliest opportunity I have.

Senator Olson: Will you support his wishes? That is what he is asking.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the importance of this bill, I would like to ask Senator Barootes how much time the Senate committee spent studying this bill and how many witnesses the committee has heard.

Senator Barootes: I think the chairman of the committee is better able to answer that question, but I do know that they undertook pre-study of the bill in December of 1985. I was not present at those particular meetings because I was not a member of that committee.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the unavailability of the transcript of the proceedings of the Social Affairs, Science and Technology Committee study of Bill C-55, and in view of the importance of the bill, I move the adjournment of the debate on this bill.

On motion of Senator Haidasz, debate adjourned.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the third reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons",

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1. Strike out paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 2(2) and substitute the following:

"(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption, or
(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood."

2. Strike out subclauses 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void."— (Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I have stood this order for more than a couple of weeks because I wanted to obtain an opinion from the Department of Justice with respect to what I feel might be a constitutional problem with regard to the adoption provisions in the proposed bill. A meeting has been arranged for next Wednesday with departmental officials as well as with Senator Flynn, Senator Nurgitz and myself, at which time I hope the matter will be clarified. Therefore, I am going to stand this motion once again until Thursday, March 20, but if any other senator would like to speak to the matter in the meantime, I would be happy to yield.

Order stands.

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON HERBICIDE PRICING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry, entitled: "Herbicide Pricing", tabled in the Senate on 13th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I simply wanted to comment on the work done with regard to this study and the process by which we arrived at proceeding with this study because I think it is one of the fine examples of the work that the Senate can do and has done in this regard.

When the Agriculture Committee was doing its study on soils and the degradation of soils, one of the comments we received came from a group in Manitoba, namely the Zero-Till Association. They pointed out to us that if there was going to be some great improvements in farming techniques and movement toward less tillage and having regard to the various recommendations that our committee at that point had not yet made, but experts in other fields had made, then the question of the cost of herbicides was one of the very basic elements. Arising out of the report received from the association, the committee decided to proceed with a study on this subject. I think it is fair to say that there was no enthusiasm in this connection from the Department of Agriculture. That was the situation both before the change of government and since the change of government. However, the committee decided to proceed in this area because it had been convinced by the presentations made to it that there was a serious problem, that there were potential answers within our own system—if we could just get some people moving—and that we had to look at it.

The committee proceeded with this study. There were no costs attached. It was done completely in-house by the Senate making use only of its own resources. Witnesses were called from here in Ottawa, so there was no travel involved and there were no expenses, except of course, for the printing of the document. But, as you will see, it is not an expensive printing process. A very valuable recommendation has emerged which can be of extreme importance to the farmers from a cost standpoint. Those who are following the agriculture industry know that right now the question of costs to farmers is at least one of the areas where we can be helpful. We may not be able to be helpful insofar as prices are concerned, where we have to depend on international prices, but so far as costs are concerned we can be helpful.

It does not make any difference which farm meeting you go to these days, the complaint is the same, namely the high input costs. The Liberal Party set up a task force some months ago which travelled across the country and they received this constant complaint.

I have a clipping concerning a Conservative Party task force meeting in Brandon, Manitoba. It is the same story:

The high cost of farm inputs is an area where government should take action.

In this regard, the Senate has taken action. I am pleased to say, as well, that the reaction to the committee's report has been excellent. I have here the front page of the Manitoba Co-operator, which is the newspaper of the pool in Manitoba. The headline on the front page states: "Senate Study Applauded". It goes on to say:

Farmers who advocate zero-till practices say they are pleased with the recent Senate report, which has recommended ways to reduce the price of agriculture pesticides. "Its fantastic," said the President of the Zero-Till Association.

I think the report has been extremely useful and well received. The question now is: Will the government take action?

This is where I think the Senate can again perform a useful role because, having now produced the report and having had a good reaction from the farming community, the next step should be to invite the minister to meet with the committee. Let us see what the minister has to say with regard to our recommendations. If he does not agree with them, then we can expect him to tell us why not. It could be that he has some better suggestions, in which case we should discuss them with him. If he does agree with what we are saying, then I think the Senate is in a position to press for action.

We can either request that the House of Commons take action on the matter or, if they do not, we could introduce a bill here so that the action is started here and then proceed to the next step.

Honourable senators, as I said at the outset, this is a perfect example of the kind of work the Senate can do and can do far better than any royal commission that we have ever appointed in this country.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Argue, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSALS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. H. A. Olson rose pursuant to notice of Wednesday, March 5, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 26th February, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, I appreciate this opportunity to say a few words to draw the attention of the Senate to the Budget speech for two reasons. One is that there are a number of economic matters of great concern to the region of Canada—I am not going to say that I represent—from which I come. Senator Flynn will recognize, of course—because he has made this speech many times—that that ought to be the highest priority of senators; it is to express the views of the region of Canada from which they come.

The other reason that it is appropriate to take advantage of this opportunity by means of an inquiry calling the attention of the Senate to the Budget speech is that that kind of topic gives a fairly wide-ranging opportunity for comment. As my comments unfold, I am sure honourable senators will realize that a number of areas, such as agriculture and the oil and gas industry, find themselves in serious economic difficulty at the present time. I want to make some comment, not so much on the proposals contained in the budget but on the failure of the government to make proposals in the budget, which, of course, does exacerbate the problem rather significantly.

With respect to agriculture, I suppose the outstanding example of this government's abdication of its responsibility is its failure to deal with the sugar-beet problem. Senator Fairbairn, Senator Molgat, myself and several others have raised this question on almost a daily basis for several weeks. Indeed, honourable senators, in a little book I have a list of questions I have asked and it dates back to May 23, 1985, when I first asked the Leader of the Government whether or not the government was going to announce a policy respecting the production of sugar—and sugar-beets, to be more specific—in Canada so that the producers and the processors could get together and make a deal, a contract, or whatever you want to call it. Up to and including today, we have had pretty well the same answer, which has been, "Wait." At some point, the Leader of the Government said, "Soon." Today he said—and I do not have his exact words before me—that probably by tomorrow at this time we would have an answer.

Honourable senators, the fact is that a year to work out a program is too long a period of time, especially when there are all kinds of precedents for what the sugar-beet producers and the sugar-beet processors require so that they can make a contract and, therefore, grow and process a crop. There is absolutely no need to wait until this late. There was nothing in the budget that dealt with it and there has been no announcement since. Honourable senators, this is a complete abdication of the responsibilities of governing this country.

The fact that international sugar prices have been depressed is not relevant because that has happened before. It happened not only this year, but it has happened intermittently for the last 25 years and perhaps even longer than that. What is new and what is devastating to those beet producers is that this government has, for whatever reason, abdicated its responsibility. It has chosen to say nothing. It did not say that a policy was going to be put in place or that payments would be made under a stabilization program. It has said nothing other than that the policy would be announced "soon."

I know honourable senators have heard me ask the questions and they have heard the reasons for my asking the questions on behalf of the sugar-beet producers in my region who are in a desperate position. They must decide whether they are going to order seed, herbicides and all of those things that are required to grow a crop. More than that, honourable senators, they have to consider the alternatives if they do not grow a crop of sugar-beets. Last year, most of them, on short notice, when it was much too late to seed sugar-beets, decided to seed soft white wheat. For those who do not know, soft white wheat is the kind of wheat that is used for making cake flour. When the producers seed 35,000 acres of additional land to soft white wheat for which there is a very limited market, it wrecks that market for the people who are traditionally growing soft white wheat. I will not go into the details now, but I would point out that it is a special crop for a very small market.

The beet producers have thousands of dollars, in some cases hundreds of thousands of dollars, tied up in equipment that is specific to grow and harvest sugar-beets, and they do not know if the government is simply going to let that industry die. I do not know whether they are or not. It now sounds like we may get an answer tomorrow. At least, they should be fair enough to the producers to say whether or not that is their position. I am sure many of those producers have hung on to their equipment trying to do whatever they can in the face of these great difficulties and depressed prices for some time, and we have not had any answers.

I should now like to deal with another subject, the matter of the crisis in farm financing and the debt servicing charges that are adding seriously and significantly to what was already a very difficult situation. The budget does not contain any relief for that at all except, if I may say so, something about commodity based mortgages. Honourable senators, I have tried to understand what that means. I think it is fair to say that the government itself does not understand what it means, because it will proceed with this plan on some sort of a trial basis. What is important is that the government has allocated $65 million to deal with the whole of the farm credit crisis in a year. If we think of that in terms of the size of the problem, it is something less than one half of 1 per cent. I think that the government should have been more generous in dealing with this severe problem because, in many respects, it caused this problem through its lack of action. I make that contention, and there are many people in this country who follow these matters closely and who find that the government's lack of action is one of the reasons why we now have an interest rate which is about four percentage points higher than that in the United States.

Allow me to clarify what I am saying. The Minister of Finance has made several speeches in public and in the other place implying that the reason for the drop in value of the Canadian dollar to near 69 cents was because of the traders in the Chicago commodity market. He then went on to say that one of these days they are going to be called to account; they are going to pay for what they have done to the Canadian dollar. The government borrowed $2.5 billion—that is in addition to the foreign exchange that was already available to it—to deal with the so-called traders in the Chicago market that were going to be called to account. But the Leader of the Government and the Minister of Finance are aware of one other thing, and that is that there is a momentum built up in terms of what happens in the commodity exchanges. Sitting back and doing nothing, day after day after day, while the Canadian dollar was falling is part of the reason why it fell so far. When it did fall to 69.12 cents, that momentum had already been built up. That is why it cost so much to try to remedy the situation. Anybody knows that in the stock markets as well as other places, the faster something gets moving, the more difficult it is to stop it. The consequence has been that the Bank of Canada had to borrow $2.5 billion, one of its most massive injections of funds, simply to stop the decline in the value of the Canadian dollar. If the government had faced up to its responsibilities sooner, that momentum would not have built up and the cost of stopping the decline in the value of the dollar and turning it around would have been substantially less.

We should also look for a moment at what that cost, and this gets back to the point I was about to make a few moments ago; that is, that we now have an interest rate which is four percentage points higher than that in the U.S. Our prime interest rate is approximately 13 per cent and that in the United States is about 9 or 9.25 per cent. This means that all of the people on floating interest rates with the banks—a situation in which most farmers find themselves—are now paying that tremendously increased interest rate. This is due to the failure of this government to act in time. I am particularly interested in the agriculture sector because it is desperate simply due to low international commodity prices. It seems to me that the government is standing back, putting in place a sort of watching brief on these farm financing problems.

I can tell honourable senators that the lack of action on the part of the government—quite apart from what happened in the international market for wheat, potatoes and other products—indicates that it has not faced up to its responsibility and that has cost us an enormous amount of money in increased additional interest charges. That would not have happened if the government had done what any responsible government ought to do.

Turning to other matters, the same argument can be applied to the energy sector. There is, perhaps, some resentment felt towards people in the oil and gas industry because it is believed that they got a lot out of the consumer some time ago. I do not know about that. What I do know is that a very difficult situation applies in that sector at present. I know that the international decline in crude oil prices is not the responsibility of the Canadian government. I accept that. But this government took some action before the steep decline in oil prices took place. I believe that the effective date was June 1, but, at any rate, the government decided that it would not intervene in the energy market at all. That was something that the Liberals did; therefore, the Conservatives do not do it. Or perhaps there is some other phoney philosophy which provides that they do not have any responsibility to govern with respect to that. They call it deregulation. Well, honourable senators, deregulation included a number of things, one of which was the end of the new oil reference price.

Let us examine for a moment or two what that means. As I stated at the outset, I do not blame the government for the decline in the international oil prices. That is happening because of the collapse of OPEC agreements and other things, particularly the action of Saudi Arabia, which has led the decision to open the valves and produce a surplus. However, honourable senators, there was in place a policy that was brought in by the Liberal government. However anyone might want to slough it off—by saying that it is the old National Energy Program brought in by the Liberal government or any of the other reasons why anyone would not assume the responsibility of governing this country—the fact is that there was a new oil reference price in place that did a number of things that would have avoided much of the difficulty we are now experiencing, quite apart from what happens to the international price.

The new oil reference price was about $5 per barrel higher than what was being paid for old oil. Oil that was discovered prior to 1973-74 is called old oil, and oil that was discovered through an investment made since 1973-74 is called new oil. New oil got a price approximately $5 per barrel higher.

Senator Bosa: Higher than what?

Senator Olson: Higher than the price of the old oil.

Let me tell honourable senators about this old oil so that they understand that there is an important difference. First, old oil was discovered, developed and brought on stream when the price of oil was about $3.50 to $4 per barrel. Investment was made in the exploration and development on that basis. Therefore, long before 1980 or 1986—I include 1980 as well because that is when the second oil shock came in—all of the capital investment in old oil had been paid off.

● (1540)

There is another factor that is included in this that people should understand. It is that 85 per cent of the so-called old oil was owned by the multinationals: Imperial Oil, Exxon, Shell, Texaco, and so on.

Senator Frith: What percentage of that was still in the ground at that point?

Senator Olson: It is hard to say. It depends on how much of it you can recover. But if you can recover, say, 30 per cent to 35 per cent of those reserves, there is probably 12 years' production left, and that could add up to something in the neighbourhood of from 4.5 billion to 5 billion barrels. That's about the figure.

My point is that there was a policy in place that was going to give some relief to the small and medium-size Canadian companies which had invested at the higher level—that is, after 1974; and there was a price of about $5 per barrel more for that classification of oil than there was for the so-called old oil.

As I have said, 85 per cent of all of the old oil was owned by the multinationals. But this government decided that it was going to throw out the new oil reference price and the differential, and the consequence of that was to hand the multinationals, which had 85 per cent of the oil production, about $5 per barrel. And from whom did they take it? They took it from the small and medium-size Canadian companies which had invested since then, and they gave it to those companies which had made all of the investment at from $3.50 to $4 per barrel and which had been paid back in full long since.

That had nothing to do with the decline in the international price. That happened away back last spring. I believe it was June 1 that the deregulation of that took effect. So this government has to stand up and say that it is guilty of making that change in the policy that was in place, and it cannot simply stand back and say, "Well, we can't do anything about international prices." I accept that they cannot, or at least that they have very little influence.

So what is going to happen? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources says that she is not going to make any intervention, because it was a Liberal policy to have NEP. I do not know why she is not going to intervene, outside of this phoney philosophy of "no intervention." I can tell honourable senators that she came to Calgary and had a meeting with the Minister of Energy from Alberta. She said, "The oil industry is going to survive." I, too, know it is going to survive, but the form in which it is going to survive is what is bothering people now—because those big multinational oil companies to which I refer, having owned 85 per cent of the so-called old oil, are also the very same companies that have all of what is referred to as the downstream activity: pipelines, the refining and the distribution—with the exception of Petro-Canada, which, of course, is also involved in that. Imperial Oil, Texaco, Shell, and so on, are the companies which have all of the downstream revenue. There are people who believe that those companies are going to use the downstream revenue to compensate for the loss in the so-called upstream—that is the price of oil that is paid to the producers at the well-head, and so on.

Of course, it is easy to understand why they do not lower the price to consumers. It is because it is in this so-called downstream area, that is after the oil goes into the refinery, that they are not lowering the price—because they certainly have lowered the price by over 50 per cent in the last four months for all of the oil going into the refineries—and this government lets them get away with it. The minister says that the oil industry is going to survive. But I predict that there will be major amalgamation and acquisition of oil reserves by the big companies, which can defend themselves against this situation—buying up, from desperate small and medium-size Canadian companies, the reserves that they have in the ground. That is exactly what will happen, and that is how the oil and gas industry will survive. That is the shape and form it will take after this period—we do not know how long it will be—transferring enormous amounts of reserves that have already been discovered away from small and medium-size Canadian companies into the hands of the multinationals.

We had some kind of policy in place to assist Canada to own a larger share of its gas and oil industry. That was part of the NEP. I am not here to say to the government, "Re-establish and put back in place all of the NEP." But if that part of it which was designed to help Canadian ownership, to help us toward attaining additional self-sufficiency, was not a good policy, then I would like to hear something from this government about what it is going to do about it—because that is how we will survive. Nearly all of the drilling off the east coast has stopped or is about to stop. They took away the program that was there to delineate what the reserves might be. Obviously, drilling at sea involves a higher cost than drilling for oil on land, but at least some very interesting discoveries were made, and even though it involved a higher cost, we should at least know what we have. All that has been taken away.

But there is more coming, unfortunately. This government has already announced that it is going to deregulate the gas industry. But even after consultation with the industry, it could not decide how it was going to do it. So the government gave itself another year. It is going to deregulate the industry on November 1, 1986. But what everyone is pretty certain about is that the price of natural gas to the producers will go down by about 35 per cent to 40 per cent between now and no later than November 1, 1986, and that will further exacerbate a situation that is already desperate.

If honourable senators do not think it is serious, yesterday we were advised that Husky Oil had laid off 300 people. That was the company that was going to build the upgrader at Lloydminster. So that has gone. Petro-Canada laid off from 300 to 400 people yesterday. They will not tell us how many they are going to lay off in total. I should like to make a further comment on what Petro-Canada is up to. I do not know what kind of instructions they have received from the minister, but it is hard to believe that any company could be that inhuman. People arrived at one of the offices in the two buildings the company has in Calgary to be told that they were through. They were asked to sign a paper for their severance pay and then told to please leave. They could not even go through their desks and take out their personal belongings. They had ordered 50 taxi cabs to be at the front door to take these people away. That is the kind of inhuman consideration given to people under these very difficult and embarrassing situations—

Senator Argue: That is a shame!

Senator Olson: It is, and one wonders what kind of instructions were given to Petro-Canada that it would act like that.

Senator Stewart: That is called carnage.

Senator Olson: It is the most inhuman thing that I have ever heard of.

Senator Argue: It is the Nielsen report.

Senator Olson: A public crown corporation has received instructions from this government to somehow cut costs. It is alleged that they are doing all this in such a way as to make the company look a little more profitable prior to selling shares to the public. If that is so, the government should hang its head in shame. And these people who have been let go are people who have held their jobs for years.

Honourable senators, I will repeat what I just said. Taxi cabs were ordered ahead of time. And when these people went into the offices, they were fired and told to go home at once. I guess it is as a result of the Nielsen report.

Syncrude has decreased its budget by some $200 million. We talk about the downturn in the gas and oil business during the last depression which, by the way, occurred all over the world, not only in Canada where we had the NEP. During that depression of 1980 and 1981, I know of no case where the oil companies cancelled surface leases with farmers. Not once did I ever hear of this happening in the district where I live. But just last week it happened to some of my neighbours. Oil companies came out and cancelled the leases that they had been negotiating for surface rights.

I hope I have been able to impress upon the Leader of the Government that the situation out there is serious.

Senator Roblin: Don't worry, you will hear from me.

Senator Olson: I want the leader to know that the situation is desperate. When I hear from him, I hope that he will say something about what the government intends to do about assuming its responsibility to govern the country in the interest of Canadians. What has happened to date is that in all circumstances where discretionary action—never mind financial commitment—was available to the government it handed over the benefits to people who are not Canadians or who are not necessarily Canadians; namely, the multinationals.

Senator Argue: Ronnie's regiment.

Senator Olson: I hope the leader will tell us what the government intends to do in this area. There are thousands of people in the industry who are wondering whether the government will ever assume its responsibility to govern and do those things that are available to it.

There are many other things in the budget, including tax increases and decreasing expenditures. By and large, I do not object to the government trying to deal with the deficit. I think that over time it is a responsible attitude. However, what I have been talking about, in terms of debt service charges for farmers, in terms of driving the prime interest rate up to 13 per cent because of inaction on the part of the government and in terms of other things it has done in the oil industry, has nothing to do with requiring large amounts of money or increasing the deficit.

I hope the government will begin to take its responsibilities seriously and not sit back with watching briefs. This leader and his colleagues have done exactly the same thing. Canadians deserve to have their government do those things, all things and such things for which the federal government is responsible. It does not have the right to stand by and watch these two important sectors of the Canadian economy go down the drain.

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, in entering into this debate on the budget, it is perhaps worth while to enquire briefly into what happened to get the economy into the state that it is in today. You might be interested to know that between 1975 and 1985 government expenditures grew at a rate of 13 per cent per year as against an increase in inflation of 8.8 per cent. In order to neutralize the effect of inflation, the then government created indexed programs and indexed personal exemptions and personal tax brackets. As a result of those expenditures and that indexation, the public debt grew from 17.5 per cent of the gross national product in 1975 to 47.3 per cent of the gross national product in 1985.

As honourable senators know, we had a recession in 1981. That recession was combined with inflation which did not subside at the same time as the growth in the economy did. The government took certain appropriate counter-cyclical actions in such areas as unemployment insurance benefits. However, what really happened was that indexation produced a double whammy. Due to inflation the outlays went up. Due to the indexation of tax brackets and personal exemptions in a receding economy, income went down. Of course, as a consequence of inflation, interest rates went up egregiously, which impacted on the very much larger public debt so that our servicing costs in the fiscal year 1984-85 were 32 per cent of total government revenues.

Before we get terribly concerned about the deficit and the national debt, I think we should put it in context.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Did I understand the honourable gentleman to say that one third of the budget went to servicing the debt, or did he say that one third of the deficit went to servicing the debt?

Senator Everett: I said that 32 per cent of government revenues went to servicing the national debt.

However, as I said, we should put the matter in context. The best way to do that is to compare the size of the deficit and the debt to the size of the deficit and the debt in the United States. Using comparable figures, in 1984 the deficit for Canada was 7.1 per cent of gross national product. In the United States it was 5.4 per cent. The overall debt in Canada in 1984 was 40.9 per cent as against 36.4 per cent in the United States. I mention that because some people say that for our deficit to be compared with that of the United States we have to multiply it by ten. I think these figures are more accurate. They indicate that in terms of total debt we are not badly out of line, and that in terms of the deficit we are not as much out of line as people sometimes suggest. That is not to say that our situation is a good one.

Senator Frith: Or that their's is.

Senator Everett: No, but in comparable terms we are not that badly out of line. That leads me to wonder what really is wrong with deficits. I think there is a great deal of misconception about them. For example, it is said that deficits cause an upward pressure on interest rates. I suppose in one sense that can be true, but during the time that we have had probably some of the worst deficits in history here and in the United States, interest rates have gone down. It is said that deficits cause crowding out of funds for private investment. Yet, at a time when deficits were as bad as they probably ever have been, at a time when the economy was expanding, there was no crowding out. It is said that deficits in Canada cause a certain amount of off-shore borrowing, but no one can prove that equation because off-shore borrowing depends on exchange rates, on interest rates and on the expectation of the changes in those two elements.

It is true that deficits create expectations of inflation in people's minds. They can cause a loss of confidence and no one would doubt for a moment that fiscal policy is somewhat restricted when you have a large debt and heavy deficits. However, in order to discuss this matter of deficits I just want to put something to you. It may have occurred to you that, in Canada, we are told that the reason our dollar is weak is because we have deficits. I think that is usually the reason given to indicate why our dollar is at 69 or 70 cents U.S. On the other hand, if you read the comments in the United States, you will find that the deficit is blamed for high interest rates and, until recently, for the strength of the American dollar. It puts me in mind of following the stock market. When the stock market has just dropped, reporters go to a stock analyst and they say, "Why?", and he will dredge up a reason of one sort or another. It seems to me that this matter of deficits has been explained by dredging up reasons that have no basis in fact.

However, there is obviously a problem with deficits and perhaps we should have a look at what it really is. The federal deficit is not like a deficit of a company or of a province, and for one reason: That is, that the federal government has the central bank there to buy its obligations, whereas a company or a province must float obligations on the market when they have a deficit. The federal government can do that, but it can also have the central bank buy its obligations and finance the deficit in that manner.

Senator Frith: In other words, it owns its own bank.

Senator Everett: That is correct, it owns its own bank with unlimited funds. There are consequences of their doing that, but the federal government has the right to do it. You will hear a lot of people state that the servicing costs of the debt will completely overwhelm us by 1990 or 1995. I say to you, honourable senators, that that just is not so. It is not so because, if that were to occur, then the federal government would monetize the debt; they would print enough money to be able to pay those costs. Inflation would be the end result and it would be exacerbated by a stimulative fiscal policy. That, therefore, is really where the problem of deficits comes in—that at some point, you are forced to monetize them, and the result is inflation.

The other problem, obviously, is the one that we are facing today, and that is if we do not accept the need to monetize the deficit, then we must accept the pain of getting back on track.

A deficit is caused purely and simply by expenditures not being covered by revenues, and there are only three ways that you can possibly handle it. One, as I say, is to monetize the debt; that is, print money in order to cover the deficit. The second is to increase revenues, and of course the problem with that is that you seriously affect your competitiveness and private initiative. The third is to reduce expenditures.

What has this government done in the most recent budget? The Minister of Finance has claimed that there will be a net expenditure reduction. He states that in 1985-86 the reduction will be $4.5 billion; in 1986-87, $6.8 billion; in 1987-88, $9.7 billion. However, what he fails to tell us is that these are reductions in planned expenditures. What he fails to tell us is that he took the trend line of the expenditures in 1984-85 and said, "They will continue, and therefore my reductions are related to the trend line itself."

What actually has been done? Let us look at what is going to happen to expenditures, and this is according to the Minister of Finance's own budget speech. In 1984-85 there will be a total expenditure of $109 billion; in 1985-86, $112 billion; in 1986-87, $117 billion and in 1987-88, $120 billion. So the trend is up, not down.

On the other hand, taxes will be $71 billion in 1984-85; $78 billion in 1985-86; $87 billion in 1986-87 and $94 billion in 1987-88. In three years, expenditures will increase by 10 per cent, but taxes will be up by 32.4 per cent. That difference will be exacerbated by the partial removal of indexation of personal tax brackets and personal tax exemptions so that that gulf will widen.

However, one must admit that in raising taxes, which is what this budget really does to a much greater extent than reducing expenditures, the government does attack the deficit. In 1984-85 the deficit will be 9.1 per cent of gross national product. By 1987-88 it will be down to 4.9 per cent of gross national product. But so far, tax increases are the main weapon that has been used by this government.

I suggest to you that there are three areas that are available to the government to reduce the deficit further. The first area, of course, is non-statutory programs and I think there the government has done a fairly good job, or is in the course of doing it. They are proposing that in 1984-85 those programs will grow by 10.7 per cent; in 1985-86 they will reduce by 1.4 per cent; in 1986-87 they will increase by .7 per cent; and 1987-88 they will increase by .5 per cent.

● (1610)

They are doing certain things that I think make some sense. For example, I read the other day that there is a private sector committee of executives from large corporations which have gone through a major readjustment in their staffing levels. They have brought those executives to Ottawa to see how they accomplished this.

Yesterday, the Nielsen task force tabled its report in the House of Commons.

The Conservative government of Premier Lyon did that in Manitoba. I think it is a worthwhile exercise; it indicates those areas of government spending that should be reviewed. One has to bear in mind that in Manitoba it really was not proceeded with, and part of the reason for that was that viewing government from a businessman's point of view is very different from viewing it from a politician's point of view. I think it is reasonable to have this sort of examination made, and I congratulate the government on doing it.

I think it becomes much more difficult to implement some of the proposals, but, nonetheless, they are there and they do indicate areas of non-statutory spending that could be inquired into and, perhaps, made a great deal more efficient. But I would say this in warning to the government; global cuts often do not work. When a government comes along and says it is going to reduce spending in a certain department or in a series of departments by a certain amount of money, one really finds in the end—at least that was the experience of the Senate Finance Committee—that they were transferred from one pocket to another and that the reduction was temporary.

Senator Roblin: The tyranny of the status quo.

Senator Everett: The tyranny of the status quo, that is quite right. I think the only way to control expenditures is to make deep inquiries into how one can improve the efficiency of a department.

When I was chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, that committee made the recommendation that the Department of Public Works be operated on the basis of revenue dependence—that is, with the same discipline as the private sector. What we were really saying—and this is in the course of being implemented—was that it could be operated on a much more efficient basis in that way rather than saying, "Cut your expenditures by 10 per cent."

The second area is one that has not been really approached by this government, and that relates to statutory programs. I understand they constitute some 60 per cent of total program expenditures. This is an area which, somehow or other, we have to deal with.

First of all, there is in our social programs this question of universality. The argument that is put forward by those who are in favour of universality is that if you do not have everybody involved in a program, it starts to lose support. But let us face the fact that the deficits we are suffering mean that we either have to raise taxes to the point that they are uneconomic, we have to monetize the debt—which would create inflation—or we have to find means of bringing our expenditures into line with the taxes that we can raise. In other words, we have to do what we can afford.

I would have thought in those circumstances that if we cannot provide 100 per cent coverage it would be far better and far more compassionate to say: "We will provide proper coverage of these benefits to those who really need it."

That is not a new concept at all. We use it in dealing with the child tax credit; we use it in the guaranteed income supplement. The tax form has provided us with a very convenient and non-demeaning needs test, and it is quite possible today to be able to do away with universality and to say: "We are going to provide proper care for those who need it."

In any event, I happen to come down on that side of the equation. I find it appalling that it was never properly debated in Parliament or among the public. It should be examined to see if there is not a better way of delivering those services.

I could go on to the example of the great debate in Ontario over extra billing. We have said, by way of legislation, that a province will suffer a penalty in federal grants if it allows doctors to extra bill. Well, I really do not understand that; I do not understand why that should be so. If we are concerned about doctors and extra billing, then why do we not impose a 25 per cent penalty on their fees if they want to extra bill so that the public saves money, and then allow them to bill on top of that? What is wrong with that? Nothing, as long as there is no restriction imposed by the medical profession on the number of doctors. If we are really honest and compassionate and care about people, why do we create a situation in which the costs are so high that we cannot give proper care? Why do we say that every doctor is the same? There are some doctors who are better than others, and if they have to charge higher rates to get a higher income so that they are less of a charge on the system, then I think it makes good sense to allow them to do that.

The other day a task force on Child Care reported, and in that report they said that they wanted to create a system in which there would be no private profit-making daycare centres. They wanted to create a system in which there would be a 50/50 sharing of child care between the user and the government, and for those who could not afford it they would use the Canada Assistance Plan in order to help them pay the other 50 per cent. They projected that by the year 2001 it would cost the Canadian budget $11 billion. It is no wonder we have deficit problems. Why would we not say that if people want to spend their own money and invest in daycare centres, they should be allowed to do so? In my province of Manitoba licences for private senior citizens' homes are gradually being removed. Further licences are not being granted to anyone who wants to build a private senior citizens' home. In order to get into a senior citizens' home, you have to go through a government board. You are also not allowed to pay more than a set rate. Then they wonder why they do not have enough senior citizens' homes. A lot of people would be prepared to pay the extra amount out of their own pockets for better care, thereby leaving more government money for those who cannot afford it. It seems to me to make eminent good sense.

I do not understand why we cannot attack that problem and why these axioms are laid down that we must have universality, that we must not allow private profit-making institutions to enter into these fields; that we must prevent people from using the resources that they have built up throughout their lives any way they want. I do not understand that and I never will.

I want to go on to the third area that I think could be used to attack the deficit, namely the area of taxation. The twenty-second annual report of the Economic Council of Canada stated the tax breaks to corporations were $18.3 billion. To put that in context, in 1954 corporations paid $1.05 billion worth of taxes and individuals paid $1.17 billion—just about the same amount. In 1982 corporations paid $8 billion worth of taxes and individuals paid $26 billion—over three times as much.

I do not blame the corporations, because the programs were there and they took advantage of them, but it does indicate that there is something seriously wrong with our tax system. We should accept some sort of neutral tax system that lowers the rates both to corporations and individuals and says, "You make up your own mind how you want to spend your money." I have never understood why the top marginal rate should be around 60 per cent so that you can go out and invest money in some crazy movie, or a MURB, or something similar—on which you are probably going to pay far too much and make very little return—in order to reduce your tax rate. I know the government has introduced a minimum tax, but that purely and simply proves the point. Would it not be far better if we lowered the tax and did away with those incentives?

I am interested to learn that the government is considering a business transfer tax, which is a form of value added tax. In the report of the Finance Committee entitled "Growth, Employment and Price Stability", we made a strong recommendation that this sort of tax be brought in, and I think it would be useful.

Finally, in dealing with this problem that we have of debt and deficits, we somehow have to attack the problem instead of each other. It is, perhaps, a little naive on my part to suggest that, but, nonetheless, I think it is true. The Minister of Finance, in his speech, blames everything on the Liberal government. The Liberals retaliate by saying, "You are killing off the lower and middle classes by increasing taxes." The truth is somewhere in between. We are in a mess, but we can get out of it. It does not make it any less valid for the opposition to criticize the government—so it should—but mindless criticisms on both sides will get us absolutely nowhere.

The problem can be cured. It does not mean that you are not in competition or in a fight in party politics, but it also does not mean that you have to have mindless debate.

On motion of Senator Bosa, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—
DEBATE ADJOURNED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 12:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, yesterday I was delighted to see that my colleagues, and especially my friend the Leader of the Government, were very anxious to start debate on the report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth. I suppose they realize the urgency of dealing with the problems of a large segment of our youth which has been referred to as the lost generation . . . However, members of our committee believe this generation can yet be saved by speedy action on the part of the various governments.

I am therefore delighted with the interest shown by the Leader of the Government, who even scolded me for not making this speech sooner. Even after nearly three years in the Senate, there are still a lot of things I don't know. Quite frankly, I thought that before making speeches, the chairman of the committee should spark the interest of the Canadian people by explaining this report and its recommendations. In three weeks, I gave nearly 150 interviews on television, on the radio and to the press. It was a real marathon, with very little time for eating or sleeping, that I can assure you. After this tour, I have the impression that the majority of the population is aware of the dramatic situation of so many young Canadians, and that our report has been well received. I am a little surprised at the apparent criticism of this vast public relations operation which should help to have the committee's recommendations taken seriously by the various levels of government at which they are aimed.

Considering my present concerns, I had little time to write a speech commensurate with the importance of the committee's report. In fact, since Monday I have given more than 100 interviews where the subject was, basically, youth and the committee's report. Every day, I start with a first interview at around seven o'clock and the last one is around eleven o'clock at night. Which means that I had to impinge on my usual sleeping hours to respond to the wishes of the Leader of the Government. In fact, I am glad he insisted, because it is entirely appropriate that the Senate should discuss youth problems which, according to the editor of the Ottawa Citizen—which I read yesterday—has gone in three days, and I quote, "to the top of the nation's agenda".

[English]

It is with much pride that on behalf of my Liberal and Conservative colleagues I present for debate the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth entitled "Youth: a Plan of Action." This report and its 26 recommendations were unanimously adopted by the full committee, and already in the four weeks since its release, the response by the public, young and old alike, has been overwhelming. By the way, by the end of last week, the first 15,000 copies of the report had already been distributed and we are printing more.

We looked at a broad range of issues of equal importance. Although our focus was wide, we regret that it was not more detailed. In fact, producing our report convinced Senator Yuzyk, myself and our colleagues that a more thorough investigation would be in order. As we say in the conclusion of our report, "If we have sparked the imagination of Canadians who will suggest other ideas, we will consider our task to have been a success."

The committee was originally formed in the Senate under the previous government in April 1984 to consider the problems facing Canadian youth. The committee was dissolved when the federal election was announced that summer, and was re-established in December. Our goal was to examine more fully and understand the reality of life in the eighties for the youth of Canada. To this end, in April 1985 we started on a series of hearings across the country, visiting a total of 11 cities and listening to over 200 oral presentations, as well as receiving 500 written submissions.

At first, our young witnesses were sceptical, and sometimes critical, of our approach to solving problems which, to them, seemed insurmountable. Yet, they convinced us of the absolute seriousness of their situation and of the intolerable nature of their problems. Criticized for having no ex-officio youth members on our committee, we undertook to speak directly with as many young people as possible. While the nature of the consultation process is such that it often focuses on those who have criticisms and who are experiencing problems, we readily admit that the majority of our young people are doing rather well. The 80 per cent who are in school, pursuing university degrees and have jobs are not without problems. However, their relative good fortune stands in striking contrast to the dismal situation of the 20 per cent with whom we dealt.

A further problem is that educational qualifications and standards vary from province to province, making it next to impossible for those who must move to continue their education in any consistent manner. University students are equally frustrated by this problem, as well as that of inadequate funding, a problem we well understood.

These obstacles in the education field make the transition to work difficult. Youth has always suffered a disproportionate level of unemployment. However, in February 1986 youth unemployment stood at 16.4 per cent, the highest level since June 1985.

[Translation]

The Prime Minister, who starts spouting statistics the minute he hears the word youth or unemployment, should add this one to his list. I repeat: in February 1986, youth unemployment was at 16.4 per cent, the highest rate since June 1985. Another statistic we never find in the government's endless enumerations: the incredibly high number of unemployed young people between 14 and 24—more than 600,000.

Youth unemployment reaches tragic proportions in certain provinces, especially in Newfoundland. Last June, at public hearings held in St. John's, the president of a youth association in Bell Island, a small Newfoundland community, told us: "There are 146 young people in our community. Only two have jobs..."

[English]

The youth unemployment rate is consistently double that of adults. Young people are first to be fired, last to be hired and are often caught in low-paying, dead-end jobs. Their frustration is mounting. With International Youth Year already forgotten and youth unemployment rising, we wonder how long the patience of our young people will last. To describe the problem as a national disaster is not an exaggeration. The hundreds of young people we spoke with are living testimony of the bitter accuracy of such a statement.

Problems in our Pacific and Atlantic regions are particularly severe. Last month, the rate of unemployment for young men aged 15-24 in Newfoundland was 36.0 per cent. While these figures speak for themselves, our committee unanimously agreed that the problem has grown to such proportions that our report must demand swift and immediate action to help the nearly 20 per cent of our young people who are in a state of despair. The social, educational and employment problems they face are intertwined and inseparable. The distinctions made in our report by each of the chapters served more to outline the problems than to divorce them from each other. The relationship between all problems led us to conceive a package of 26 recommendations which could begin to alleviate the situation of our youth.

As a committee, we were heartened by the energy and enthusiasm of the young people we met. We are also optimistic that the government, and all governments in this country, will be alerted, as we were, by the gravity of the situation for too many of our young people. We must believe that our colleagues in the Senate and in the other place will show the sensitivity, the compassion and the understanding to consider our report and its recommendations and to move towards solving some of the problems illustrated in our report.

Our plan of action focuses on co-operation—co-operation between governments, communities, educators, business people, young and old alike. It is through co-operation that the problems will be better understood, and through swift positive action that these problems will be solved.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I would have a great deal more to say about our committee's report, but as I pointed out when I started, circumstances kept me from spending more time preparing this speech. However, I am sure that my colleagues on the committee and many other senators are ready to continue where I have left off. Thank you.

On motion of Senator Phillips, for Senator Yuzyk, debate adjourned.

THIRD READING

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. Richard A. Doyle: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We do not usually grant leave for third reading immediately unless there is going to be Royal Assent, or for some other valid reason. But there is another reason, which has been explained to me, for requesting third reading immediately. As I think is well known, we do not oppose this bill and, therefore, we grant leave and support third reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

[English]

THE BUDGET

VERSION OF BUDGET PAPER SENT TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether it is a fact that there has been a budget paper entitled "The Canadian Budget in Perspective," which has been circulated to our Canadian embassies abroad, which paints a picture of the state of the Canadian economy, particularly the Canadian debt, that is distinctly different from the picture which is contained in the budget papers circulated to Canadians, particularly to Canadian parliamentarians.

• (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must take the question as notice, honourable senators.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for taking the question as notice.

In making his investigation, if it is a fact that this particular paper has been made available abroad, would the Leader of the Government ensure that copies are made available to members of Parliament and to senators so that we can be informed as to what may be an analysis and perspective that is different from the one we have received to date?

Senator Roblin: At first blush, I see no reason why I should not accept the request, and I will make inquiries about it.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CRITICISM CONTAINED IN STUDY TEAM REPORT TO TASK FORCE ON PROGRAM REVIEW

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate stemming from one of the volumes of the Nielsen report, namely, "Economic Growth Agriculture". I refer to what I think are some inaccurate, unfair and disparaging remarks about the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board. I and, I believe, the country would value the opinion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate on this important question.

I quote from the report, which states:

The lack of concentrated leadership shows up in the lack of planning.

The leadership is not concentrated in one person; it is concentrated in five commissioners who have equal authority. I think there are great advantages in that.

The report goes on to state:

It was admitted that no thought had been given to what would happen if one of our large markets disappeared.

I do not believe that to be accurate. The board has markets in mind all the time, and I believe they have developed markets in 60 countries quite apart from those of our big customers. I know from experience that the board is giving a tremendous amount of thought not just to what will happen if the big markets are lost but to maintaining those big markets and to improving our position in those markets, one of which is the Soviet Union. The big challenge to Canadians is to buy more goods from the Soviet Union than we now do so that they will, we hope, continue to buy $2 billion worth of grain or more, annually, from us in the years ahead.

Then, after the deep-thinkers have looked at the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board, the report goes on to make the following amazing statement:

In closing, one has to wonder whether an organization such as the Canadian Wheat Board is a liability or an asset.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Argue: I say that they have no analytical powers, no common sense, and they lack information.

The report then goes on to state:

It—

—whatever “it” is; perhaps “it” is this liability—

It discourages criticism, tends to stifle innovation, slows down strategic thinking and could become a vehicle to hide mistakes.

The board encourages criticism. It has an advisory committee consisting of 11 elected farmers to discuss their affairs at monthly meetings and to hear the criticisms of farmers. They go out among the farmers and hold public hearings to hear criticisms and comments. The report says that they “stifle innovation.” They are so innovative that the Americans have been pushed out of what they thought were some of their markets; and the result is an increase in our share of the world market.

I ask the Leader of the Government to comment on this statement. In my judgment, the Canadian Wheat Board operates the most successful business in Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I may go some distance in relieving the anxiety of my honourable friend about the Canadian Wheat Board if I tell him that the opinions presented in this series of reports are nothing but that. They are options; they are not even recommendations. As the committee itself recognizes, the government will undoubtedly find some of these options to be workable and others that are not:

The groups of people brought together for a few weeks to brainstorm the management of $92 billion worth of public services were not restrained by either the burden of political responsibility nor an intimate program knowledge of public administrators.

When my honourable friend hears those words, I think he will perhaps find that it by no means follows that because an option has been presented in this report, it will become the policy of the government. None of these matters at the present time is the policy of the government, with the exception of several which, in the course of the past 18 months, have been dealt with. But I must tell the honourable senator that I, too, am a fan of the Wheat Board.

Senator Argue: Well, that's a pretty neutral comment. I thought that the government leader would not make exactly that comment. The preamble was okay, but I thought there would be some recognition of the tremendous amount of good work, of efficient work, of businesslike work, that the Canadian Wheat Board continues to do in the international market to sell all of our high quality wheat at premium prices. That is a very major accomplishment. I would have liked to see some supportive statements of what is there and how the government could support this tremendously good operation—instead of this neutral attitude: “They came in, they were not inhibited, they made lots of criticism,” but no defence of this operation, which is fully supported by the producers in western Canada.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend cannot really object if I described to him the words of the committee itself, how it regarded the options it has presented. I am just giving the honourable senator the facts of the matter.

As for the Canadian Wheat Board, he and I have been on several committees of the Senate and we have been interested in the question of wheat; and I do not believe that Senator Argue and I have ever had any disagreement about the value of the Canadian Wheat Board, or the regard in which it is held by farmers in western Canada. It is an institution, and I believe it will long remain such an institution, in the marketing of our wheat; and in the next few months, and in the years to come, when we are facing enormous difficulties, I suggest, in the marketing of wheat, the value of the Wheat Board will be demonstrated over and over again.

Senator Argue: I appreciate that answer as being a much more helpful one. I would ask the Leader of the Government what role can be played by parliamentary committees, either in the other house or this house, if some of these actions might be seriously contemplated, at a time when agriculture generally and western Canadian grain farmers in particular are facing very difficult circumstances. Can we get some assurance—just a plain statement—that there will be no removal of the cash advance provision that is now available, and that there will be no attempt to assess a risk premium for credit grain sales against the Wheat Board, which is against the price of wheat paid to the producers?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe the policy of the government is very clear. We intend to consult Parliament on every one of these issues. That is not to say that we are going to act on every one of these issues, because we certainly are not. We will find some good and some bad; but we think the proper procedure to follow is to let the parliamentary process unroll. Consequently, in the House of Commons all the reports have already been referred to the appropriate committees, and I have been giving some thought to what we should do in the Senate. I took the liberty of consulting with the honourable the Leader of the Opposition this morning on what might be the best method to follow so that the Senate might have a full opportunity to examine all of these issues, no matter what our preconceived opinions might be—because we all have some. I believe the Senate should have the opportunity to examine them.

If we want to have hearings, that should be done so that we can come to our own decisions as to which of these things we wish to throw out and those which we do not. After the Leader of the Opposition and I have various caucuses to obtain their views, I hope that before long we can get this rather massive job on the road.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—AGENDA

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, yesterday I directed a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the agenda for the forthcoming meeting between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States. At page 2130 of the Debates of the Senate, he said:

—it is not customary to announce the agenda in advance. We have to wait until the meeting takes place.

Similarly, with regard to my question dealing with matters not on the agenda but of public concern, he said that he would have to wait for a statement. I am informed by a source that I consider completely reliable, though I am not at liberty to disclose it, that a briefing took place yesterday morning between senior government officials and members of the press in which the matters to be discussed at the meeting next week between the President and the Prime Minister were outlined and discussed. I wonder if the Leader would care to comment.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is quite right. Such a meeting did take place. I am not entirely sure, though, that anything more happened than the presentation of the background to some of these issues, such as acid rain, to bring people up to date on the issues that had already been placed on the agenda on previous occasions and which would be covered again. Since my honourable friend has raised the point, I have received a booklet, a background booklet, which was the subject of the meeting the other day with respect to this matter. It gives some idea of those items which background books cover which, obviously, would reiterate the fact that, for example, acid rain is an unfinished item on the agenda. I would like to send my friend a copy of that book so that he will know as much as I do about the matter.

Senator Sinclair: In a report by the Canadian Press it was stated that the third item on the bilateral agenda includes defence and security issues. In light of the importance of security matters, I wonder if the leader could comment on that item.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that I had better stick to my plan, and that is to send my honourable friend a copy of the document which was discussed at the meeting. It will tell him better than I can the exact status of these various matters. Frankly, I was under the impression that every member of the Senate had received a copy of the document. However, I shall see that my honourable friend gets one.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Do I understand that the Leader of the Government is saying that all that was discussed at this confidential press meeting was this document, the background papers that were circulated to members of the House of Commons and to members of the Senate? Is that all that took place at that meeting?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I was not present at that meeting, so I cannot answer categorically. However, I shall make inquiries to see whether or not the discussions branched into other subjects.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question on the same matter. Yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government whether or not energy pricing and related matters were on the agenda. Now he tells us that there was published a pamphlet that explains the background to the items on the agenda. How in the name of common sense can you get an explanation of the background of the agenda items without knowing the agenda? I asked the leader whether or not the crisis in the international energy market would be on the agenda. His answer was to the effect that I should know as well as he does that we do not announce the agenda. Then the government holds a press conference about the agenda. Is this an indication of the new way in which we are going to see Canada governed?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my honourable friend need not disturb himself. After he has seen a copy of the document I am talking about, he will have a better idea of what went on. However, I realize that I have been asked if there was more to the meeting, and I intend to find out.

Senator Olson: May we have an answer as to whether or not energy is on the agenda? It should not be difficult if the leader has read the document. Is the subject included or is it not?

Senator Roblin: I cannot enlarge upon my previous answer.

Senator Olson: Then it is a new form of government.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT

EFFECT OF PRIME MINISTER'S STATEMENTS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government on a different matter. I have recalled to members of this chamber the very distinguished Canadian, Leonard Brockington, and his tremendous ability for running numerous adjectives before nouns. He has been known throughout Canada since time immemorial, and I am sure the leader, being from Winnipeg, will have heard of him many times. It seems as if his ability to run adjectives before nouns has been picked up by others. I would like to quote a news article in today's Ottawa Citizen, which states that the Prime Minister, while at an investment meeting at the Conference Centre in Toronto, said:

Bring your investment capital to Canada and you will find a secure and a productive and an interesting, challenging and stimulating country that we can build here together.

In light of what the Prime Minister had to say at the meeting of the Economic Club in New York shortly after the election of 1984, why have we not been inundated with American dollars over the period of his stewardship of Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not know of my own knowledge whether the statement made by my honourable friend is true. I shall investigate the figures and perhaps I can give him a delayed answer.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, you may recall that not very long ago the Prime Minister of Canada in full flight of rhetoric said, "Canada is broke." How can it be a good place to invest, "interesting, challenging and stimulating"?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, after the recent budget, Canada will be a little less broke.

Senator Frith: A little less!

AGRICULTURE

SUGAR-BEET INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION PAYMENTS— GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I hold in my hands a press release from the government entitled, "Domestic Sugar-Beet Policy".

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Fairbairn: I am almost breathless—

Senator Doody: Almost?

Senator Fairbairn: —after a year of waiting for this short document. Before I fling my arms around the Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: Let the record show that Senator Roblin said, "Hear, hear!"

Senator Fairbairn: I find that the document raises as many questions as I had hoped it would answer. Briefly, it speaks of the policy for the future as being a cost-shared stabilization program, that the government will complement it by continuing to seek an international sugar agreement for the future and that the government will provide assistance to seed a crop this year. However, I cannot find in the document even mention of a reference to the stabilization payments for the crops grown in the years 1983 and 1984. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate would indicate where these payments, which I had understood were to be in some way part of this policy, stand in relation to this announcement.

● (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I can tell my honourable friend that sugar-beets have not so far been a named product under the Agricultural Stabilization Act, so there has been nothing in the past that enables a stabilization payment to be made in the way in which she indicates. When we came into office, we found that no provision had been made for any form of payment of this kind in the 1982-83 budget, or, indeed, in the 1983-84 budget. I think those were the years, honourable senators. Therefore, we were faced with the fact that there had been no provision made for 1983 and 1984, which makes it difficult for us to provide for payments for those years.

Senator Olson: That is absolute nonsense.

Senator Roblin: In 1985 the government made a contribution to the sugar-beet industry in order to ensure the planting of a crop that year, and we intend to do the same thing this year. There is a fund of approximately $11 million or $12 million which has been set aside for seed money for the 1986 crop year, and we are now talking with the sugar-beet growers to decide the way in which that money should be distributed to them.

For the next year, the federal government will be setting up a stabilization fund with the growers, and for subsequent years we shall try to negotiate a three-way stabilization fund in which the provinces will take part.

There is another very significant aspect to the government's policy and that has to do with who benefits from the sugar quota that we have in the United States, which is worth quite a lot of money. It is the opinion of the government that the sugar-beet growers should have access to some of that advantage, and we are promoting that idea and hope to have an agreement between all elements of the industry on that before too long.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. The Leader of the Government seems to think for some reason that if there was not a provision made in an earlier budget for the stabilization payment for the 1983 crop, it was the fault of the previous government. Why does he not tell the truth? The truth is that you do not establish any stabilization program under the Stabilization Act until the production from the crop is accounted for. The 1983 crop, of course, is processed in the fall of 1983 and is sold throughout the year. Therefore it is not until the fall of 1984 that you can even calculate the figures that both the producers and the processors get for the 1983 crop year.

If my honourable friend's memory fails him, I would like to remind him that this government was elected on September 4, 1984, and took office on September 17, 1984. Under all of the ordinary circumstances that I have just described, action with respect to stabilization payments is taken after the crop is sold from the previous production year, because it is only then you can decide what the stabilization payment ought to be. Therefore, he cannot come into this chamber and say that there is a problem because someone previously did not make a provision. If he wants to be honest and say that this government has no intention of making a payment for the 1983 crop, he can do so. Now, apparently, the government has no intention of making a payment for the 1984 crop or for the 1985 crop. In any case, in Alberta they will not need it for the 1985 crop, because there was none. Nevertheless, the Leader of the Government in the Senate should not try to mislead this house as to the mechanism and process for setting the stabilization payments.

Senator Roblin: I have no intention of trying to mislead the house. I will examine what I have said carefully and, if I am in error, I will admit it. There is no difficulty in that.

I simply say that in 1985 we did make some financial provision for the sugar-beet industry and we are doing so in 1986. We hope that from then on we will have the matter properly dealt with under a regular stabilization fund, in the first instance between the federal government and the growers and, in the second instance, in subsequent years, if we are successful, with the provinces that are concerned as well as the federal government and the industry.

On those matters, we have been in consultation over recent days with leaders of the industry and while one cannot be sure as to the final outcome, we believe that they will do the best they can with the offer that has been made.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. I have received a press release from the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of State for the Wheat Board, Mr. Charles Mayer, which says that there is a provision of funds for a payment for the 1986 crop, but there is no mention of the 1985 crop, of which one was grown in Manitoba and another in Quebec, of the 1984 crop or the 1983 crop. Does that mean that the government is announcing that there will be no stabilization payment for those crops?

Senator Roblin: What the government is announcing is that there will be a contribution which might be described as seed money for this present 1986 seeding season and that at the end of the 1986 season, when the stabilization plan is in effect, if there is a deficiency for the 1986 crop that the stabilization plan ought to make up, it will be in order to do so.

Senator Olson: That is an interesting statement, but it does not answer the question I asked. I asked whether the government is saying, by its silence in this release, that there will be no stabilization payments for the years 1983, 1984 and 1985.

Senator Roblin: I am saying that the government has $12 million, and that is all, to contribute to the sugar-beet industry at the present time, and it is being distributed in the form of seed money.

Senator Frith: The answer is that you are right.

Senator Olson: Yes, I am right.

Hon. Hazen Argue: By way of a further supplementary question, I would like to ask whether the Minister of Agriculture is continuing to ask for stabilization payments for 1983, 1984 and 1985. His predecessor, the Honourable Eugene Whelan, would have campaigned so hard that we would have undoubtedly had stabilization payments in each of those three years, to the consternation of the Minister of Finance and a lot of his colleagues, but he would have won. My question is: Has Mr. Wise given up the fight?

Senator Roblin: Mr. Wise never gives up the fight. He does not always win, but he continues to fight.

Senator Argue: Is he continuing to press for stabilization payments in 1983, 1984 and 1985?

Senator Roblin: With respect to that precise question, I will have to ask him.

Senator Fairbairn: I have a further supplementary, following from the questions of Senator Argue and Senator Olson. The question of those previous years is a vital one, particularly for the younger farmers whose very existence in the industry, if it is to continue, will be very much in jeopardy if none of that stabilization money for the past years is made available to them. My supplementary question is to ask the government whether the money that is described as providing assistance to seed a crop this year will be offered to the farmers prior to the seeding of their crop. Secondly, would this be a one-shot payment prior to the seeding of the crop to assist them in that sense, or would it in some way be paid after the seeding of the crop?

Senator Roblin: It is the hope of the government that the industry will agree that the major portion of the money should be distributed quite soon. It may be that some remainder will need to be left over because the way in which these moneys are distributed is related to the sugar-beet content of the crops from the various farmers in the various parts of the country, and you never know that until it is all over, as Senator Olson has so graphically outlined. Therefore, the balance of those payments may need to wait until the sugar-beet content of the various supplies has been decided. However, the hope is to distribute most of the money soon for this spring's operation.

The Minister of Agriculture and his department are canvassing this situation with the sugar-beet growers, because we may have ideas but they will have theirs, and we want to see how close we can come to a meeting of minds as to the best way to handle the matter.

Senator Fairbairn: I have another supplementary question. I am sure that the growers will be doing their best to use whatever money is in the fund to the very best effect so that a crop can be produced. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate whether there is any agreement this year with the provincial governments, as there was during discussions last year, that they will be matching or contributing in any way towards providing assistance for the seeding of this year's crop?

Senator Roblin: Without speaking authoritatively or on behalf of anybody else, I think there is an expectation in certain quarters that some of the provincial governments will add to the payments that we have been talking about.

As for the official stabilization plan, we expect it will be a two-party plan for the first year, simply because we do not want to have the whole thing hung up because we have not reached an agreement with the provinces as of the present time. We think it is better to go ahead on a two-party basis and at least nail that down.

In the following year, having given the provinces reasonable notice so that they can adjust their affairs, we would want them to participate in a tripartite arrangement.

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I wonder when the Leader of the Government in the Senate can tell me how much longer I will have to wait before I can raise my hand and say, "I am pleased to have in my hand a potato stabilization policy for Canada."

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I recall, in connection with the sugar-beet industry, that when the Minister of State (Canadian Wheat Board) was making the distribution of payments to the sugar-beet industry last spring, he said at that time he expected to have a policy for this year in place by April 1, 1986. Although that was not soon enough to suit some people, I am glad that he made that target.

I am going to tell my honourable friend that I want to save the potato growers' representatives in this house the pains of having to ask me on a daily basis what the government is going to do about the potato industry. I tell my honourable friend that I will do my best to see that we get as prompt an answer as we can.

I can tell him that the question is on the table and that I am hopeful there will be an answer—

Senator Bonnell: Soon.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to say when; I have learned my lesson on "when". I am not going to say when, I am not even going to say soon—

Senator Frith: How about, "In due course"?

Senator Roblin: I will simply say that I will press for that as quickly as I can. I am not even going to say, "In due course".

Senator Frith: "Later", then.

ENERGY

REDUCTION IN GASOLINE PRICES

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I believe that the price of gasoline went down by 2 cents a litre at the pumps today. Does the government anticipate a further reduction in prices in the near future? I also ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to comment on the statement made by the minister in the other place yesterday to the effect that prices in Victoria had dropped by 11 cents a litre since mid-January.

Is that a misquotation? Is that a hope? Or did the oil companies double-cross the minister and not drop the price by that amount?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend is right when he says that there has been a reduction in gasoline prices. The price went down by 2 cents a litre in February, and in many cases the price went down by 2 cents a litre again, but it is interesting to know that in some places the price has gone down even more. In Vancouver the price of gasoline has been reduced by 3 cents, and in parts of southern Ontario, according to the press report I have, the price has gone down by more than 8 cents due to the keen competition in that part of the country, which is probably the best thing that could happen.

Regarding Victoria, I saw the minister's statement; I do not think it is accurate. I think the minister was reading from the wrong clip sheet. We will have to ask her to look at it again.

Senator Argue: Since the price in the United States today is slightly over 30 cents a litre Canadian money, does the government think that that lower price can be reached here?

Senator Roblin: I do not know about that, but I am not going to be pleased myself unless our prices show further and substantial reductions.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and follows on the comments made by my colleague from Prince Edward Island, the Honourable Senator Bonnell.

I am slightly worried on this day, now that measures have been announced for the sugar-beet industry, that some of our representations could be misinterpreted or the wires might be crossed, so to speak. I know that with respect to the sugar-beet industry we are talking about seed money; in the potato industry it is not so much seed money that is required—because we have the seed—but it is the seeding money that is at stake for this year. That would only be a short-term solution and would benefit this year's campaign only.

I think what Senator Bonnell and I are trying to impress on the government is the need for a long-term strategy to deal with the dynamics and the mechanics of the potato industry with respect to marketing and the various forces within it. It is much more complicated, I believe, than the Canadian sugar-beet industry—and I am not taking any merit away from that particular sector.

What I really want to impress on the Leader of the Government, so that he will relay it to Minister Wise, is that we should do something to help the growers this year in terms of cash, but more important, that there should be a long-term strategy for the potato industry in Canada. I say this so that there may be no confusion in the message we are trying to get across to the government.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I assure my honourable friend that his message is received.

A dollar is a dollar is a dollar these days, and it is important to get some financial support, but I understand my friend's view that he would rather see a consistent long-term program as opposed to an ad hoc one.

Whether it is possible to satisfy him or not, I do not know, but I will certainly see that his views receive consideration by the minister.

Senator Corbin: So that there is no confusion, I am not at all saying that there should not be an ad hoc program for this year in terms of the cash needs of the growers. In fact, federal governments in the past have, through stabilization formulae, helped the potato industry. As I forewarned last year, I suspect that the government may well have to do that again this year.

But the potato farmers do not want handouts; they want a long-term stabilization program. Having said that, I can add that the Leader of the Government and I are on the same wavelength.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—STATUS OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): The Leader of the Government, I believe in replying to questions asked by Senator Sinclair, referred to a document that had been circulated in connection with the Washington Summit. That document is entitled: "Washington Summit, March 18-19, Background Papers".

May I ask the Leader of the Government whether this is a paper put out by the Department of External Affairs as a background document, or does it have any other status? All I can find on the document is "External Affairs, Canada", which would lead me to believe that it is a document that was put out by the bureaucracy, but I should like to know whether that is correct or not.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think it is quite likely that the bureaucracy prepared the document. I am sure, also, that it had the overview of the minister, but I will try to get a more explicit definition of just who is responsible for that document.

Senator MacEachen: I think that is quite important, because there is in the document more than just background papers; there is quite a bit of commentary. One section is entitled: "Canada's Relationship with the United States—an Overview". I should like to read one sentence from that overview. It states:

On December 10, 1984, the Prime Minister gave a major speech to the Economic Club of New York in which he outlined initiatives to manage bilateral affairs and declared that the Government was committed to rebuilding Canada's image as a free, tolerant and independent nation—

I would take great offence if it were my understanding that the officials in the Department of External Affairs subscribe to the view that before that speech Canada was not a "free, tolerant and independent nation." I think that is pretty insufferable. Whatever one may think of the Prime Minister's enthusiasms, it certainly is offensive to have a document circulated and in the hands of every American newspaper in Washington which more than implies that Canada was not a free, tolerant, and independent nation. I would like to know whether officials take responsibility for repeating this kind of nonsense and, if so, whether they will be prepared to defend their views before our committee at some time. I take a very serious view of this matter and I believe it would be a good idea if this paper were either corrected or withdrawn because of this implication and this statement. After all, Canada is not the Philippines, and on December 10, 1984, the Prime Minister was not Cory Aquino and able to say that Canada heretofore was not free, independent and tolerant. It is offensive not only to those of us who have served in the government, but I think it is offensive to the Canadian people—

● (1500)

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: —to suggest that Canada was not a tolerant, free and independent nation and that the Prime Minister had to fix that up. Really, isn't it going too far and shouldn't External Affairs try to do something to correct that particularly offensive paragraph?

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I really do not find it surprising that a government document should quote the Prime Minister. Whether one agrees with what he said is a matter of opinion. You can disagree with it.

Senator Frith: It is not whether "one" agrees; he is asking whether "they" agree.

Senator Roblin: Well, if my honourable friend will just contain himself a little, I will give him my opinion, for what it is worth.

Senator Frith: That is not what he is asking for.

Senator Roblin: Just a minute. Wait until I finish my statement. The minister, as all ministers must, makes himself responsible for that document. I do not care who wrote it; if it comes under the aegis of his department he has to accept the responsibility for it. I think that is pretty clear. If my honourable friend wants to discuss it with the minister some time before a suitable committee, I daresay we could prevail upon the minister to be there. The fact that this document quotes a statement of the Prime Minister which has already received wide publicity in the United States—in view of where it was originally uttered—I do not think we can be too harsh on those who prepared it. They are dealing with a statement made by him. You do not like the statement, that is fair enough.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it is clear that different documents issuing from External Affairs have different status. Some documents never reach the minister and are put out under the authority of the department. Oftentimes, when documents are put out by departments, the statement is included, "Published under the authority of the minister." This simply says, "External Affairs, Canada." In the overview article, the Prime Minister is not directly quoted; there are no quotation marks. His speech at the Economic Club was a long speech. Obviously somebody had to select what was to be included in the overview and at least make reference to that part of the speech in which this subject was dealt with, even though it was not quoted. I want to know whether the minister read this and approved it or whether it was put out by Mr. Taylor and departmental officials, because the document itself leads us to believe that it was departmental officials who, I would hope, when confronted with such total nonsense, would say, "Well, isn't it going too far to suggest that in recent years Canada was not free, independent and tolerant?" To have this material sent down to the United States and become a document that will be part of our history is what concerns me.

I was offended when the Prime Minister made his speech at the Economic Club in which these references are included, but it was a speech of 16 pages in length and not all of it referred to in this overview. I would like to get some satisfaction on this point from the Leader of the Government. I do not think it is enough to say, "Well, the minister takes responsibility for it." That is not what is said in the document.

Senator Roblin: I will do my best to find out under what authority it was issued. That is what he is asking me.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers to questions. I like to have some every week, if I can, because I have to feed the lions on the other side, throw them a bone, as it were!

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRANS-BORDER POLLUTION PROBLEMS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 19 last by the Honourable Senator Guay regarding Canada-United States Relations—Trans-border Pollution Problems.

(The answer follows:)

The United States Department of Energy issued a draft report on January 16, 1986, narrowing the number of areas under consideration for the second U.S. nuclear waste repository from 235 to 20. Though there were no areas within 25 miles of the Canada-U.S. border identified in the report, there are a number of areas that are in or very close to drainage basins that flow into Canada. There are four areas in Minnesota in the Red River basin, as well as areas in the Great Lakes basin and another in the St. Croix River basin. After the report identifying 20 areas is issued in final form in July, 1986, field studies will begin on these areas to identify 3 finalists in 1991. The final, single selection will be made in 1998.

The Canadian government has been very active in telling the United States that any site selected for the U.S. nuclear waste repository must present no risk to this or future generations of Canadians or to the Canadian environment. The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, has discussed the issue several times over the past year with the U.S. Secretary of State Shultz. They can be expected to discuss it again at their next meeting. Last spring, these discussions established Canada-U.S. consultations to ensure that detailed Canadian views are addressed by the U.S. in a timely and effective manner. The Ministers of the Environment and Energy, Mines and Resources have also raised this issue with their U.S. counterparts. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has written to Secretary Shultz, in addition to their discussions, and the Canadian Embassy in Washington, on his instructions, sent two diplomatic notes to the U.S. Government setting out the Canadian position.

The Government is continuing its cooperation with the provinces. The Premier of Manitoba has thanked the Prime Minister in a letter for the cooperation and support Manitoba has received from the Secretary of State for External Affairs. The provinces are contributing their analyses and concerns to the Canadian preparations for the next consultation with the United States, which will take place in early April.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL OIL PRICING—AGENDA ITEM AT ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 13 last by the Honourable Senator Austin regarding International Oil Pricing—Agenda Item at Economic Summit.

(The answer follows:)

International oil pricing is not currently an agenda item for the Tokyo Summit, although officials anticipate that it will be addressed in broader terms.

Canada, in its first year of deregulation, is not likely to endorse the concept of a production ceiling or floor price for oil. However, we would not be averse to encouraging constructive dialogue between producing and consuming nations towards solving current difficulties in the international oil market.

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the bill now before us for third reading in this chamber has two major components to it. The non-contentious part of this bill concerns the presumption of death of a child and gives the minister powers to determine the date of death of that child for purposes of the administration of the Family Allowances Act. Although there was extensive discussion and evidence from witnesses in the committee in the other place, it has not been the subject of debate here in the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. I will not comment on this component of the bill except to say that it seems reasonable and acceptable.

The contentious element of the bill concerns the partial de-indexing of the family allowances paid largely to mothers in Canada for each child up to the age of 18. Here again there are two issues at stake in this proposed change—a change which a majority of members of our committee profoundly regret that the government has decided to make; a change which we believe will not serve the interests of families and children or the values of Canadian citizens.

The two issues concerning the partial de-indexing are, on the one hand, poverty, and on the other, policy toward families and children. The issue which was the subject of Senator Graham's speech on this bill yesterday was poverty. We are in agreement in the committee that there are too many families living in need in Canada. We are in agreement that children are suffering deprivation with possible long-term effects on their health and well-being, and that too many parents are struggling terribly hard against great odds to give their children decent lives. We are in agreement that redistribution of income is required so that those who are well off share their worldly goods with Canadians who are less well off, and so that all Canadians share with those families who are bringing up children—who are, after all, the country's greatest natural resource and our future.

There is no disagreement among us on those ideas and concepts, so far as I can tell.

On the issue of poverty, where we part company is in determining how this sharing shall take place, and in determining who are, in fact, the people in poverty. The thrust of the government's changes in the family and child benefits package at the legislative and budget level has been to plan a significant decrease of universal benefits through the partial de-indexing of the family allowance and the reduction of child tax exemptions, and a major increase in the negative child tax credit, a targeted program. Although we have been in favour of increasing the negative child tax credit because it does provide more money to those families who have the lowest incomes, we have disagreed strongly with the reduction in the turning point at which significant benefits are received from the child tax credit. In effect, the definition of "being in need" is squeezed lower and lower now to apply to families with less than $15,000 per year. So the problems of the working poor who, for many years, have been the most neglected and needy group in Canada, are dramatically intensified. When, after the recent budget, the newspapers ran stories about working people and those who used to consider themselves to be middle class now going to food banks and other community sources of help, the media were showing the impact of pushing down that point at which redistribution occurs. More and more people are being forced on to community, church and private sources of charity.

There is no point in increasing support to those "most in need," as the Conservative government says, if those "most in need" are, in reality, the truly desperate. Those "most in need" constitute a much larger group of Canadians for whom the harsh facts of daily life mean that transfer payments such as family allowances and child tax credits are crucial parts of the family budget.

Even on the poverty issue, we take strong objection to the reduction in the level of income for access to the child tax credit and to the labelling of desperately-struggling people, a growing class in our society, who need a great deal more than is being offered, as "those most in need," a phrase which is becoming a euphemism for desperation.

Leonard Marsh, in his study, Social Security in Canada, published in 1943, was reacting, in large part, to the circumstances of the depression. The discussion which he raised is important to the ongoing study of social security revision. He points both to the special circumstances of poverty which arose from that depression and the normal ups and downs of family life and income which go on when the economy has improved.

I would like to concentrate this afternoon not on the poverty issues, real though they are, but on the other issue at stake in this debate, and that is the need for family allowances in all families, not only families in poverty.

Two major points were brought home to us by the witnesses who were kind enough to appear before our committee recently. The majority of witnesses made reference to the very important symbolic significance of the family allowance. It is, as they pointed out to us, the only recognition directly given by Canadians as a whole, through their government, to the crucial and important roles of parents and children in Canadian life. The family allowance arrives each month, and its arrival has an important positive message: "You are receiving this money because you are a mother, or a parent, with young children, not because you are poor; not because you live in an economically-depressed region; and not because you are better or less well-educated than the mother next door: You are receiving this money because you are undertaking, on behalf of all of us, the nurturance and development of a young Canadian." That is the significance of the family allowance as opposed to all other forms of income redistribution and benefits for families and children.

The amount of the family allowance cheque may not be as significant for some people as the symbolism of that cheque. For women, in particular, who are at home with their children and who have no other independent source of funds, the family allowance cheque is a reminder of the importance which we attach to their work as mothers and as parents in Canadian society. They are not forgotten and not unrecognized by all of us. The mere fact of being a mother brings the family allowance. It is not a competitive situation. You do not have to be the best mother, the brightest mother, the most beautiful mother or the poorest mother. It is being a mother—or, in some cases, a father—which is enough to qualify you to receive this cheque.

Senator Bonnell proposed in the Senate report, "Child at Risk"—and I agree—that this allowance should begin when the mother is pregnant—before the child is born—so that the development of the child, through care for the mother, is proceeded with carefully.

We should not underestimate the symbolic importance to Canadians—those with children and those without, including mothers, fathers and grandparents, the rich and the poor, people of all viewpoints and persuasions, all of those who have thought about it—of the family allowance.

That the family allowance should be subject to income tax as is the other income of the family is only reasonable, but that is quite a separate matter from the symbolic recognition of receiving the allowance. To give the family allowance universally and then tax it back on the basis of family income is to recognize the role of parenting and to redistribute at the same time.

Should the family allowance be only a small symbolic amount of money, which it is rapidly becoming under this scheme proposed by this government, as discussed by Senator Graham and others? Is it reasonable to reduce the family allowance to insignificance by 1990 in comparison to the more redistributive, negative child tax credit? I leave aside the question of child tax exemptions which are more beneficial to those who are paying higher taxes and which are regressive in the tax system.

I should now like to state the reasons why I believe the family allowance should not be only a symbolic sum. These reasons were discussed by Leonard Marsh and others in the 1940s. Paying wages in our society is a very arbitrary system born of our history and the differentials in power which groups have in our economy. As the debate on pay equity has shown, over the last 10 to 15 years in Canada some people are paid less than others not because the value of their work is less, but because they have not, traditionally, commanded the power to raise their wages relative to those of others. It has been shown by experience, by the wage system in Australia, that equal pay for work of equal value does not have distorting effects on the labour market; does not cause women to lose jobs—in fact, female labour force participation has increased since they introduced that system in Australia in 1972—and it does not bankrupt employers.

One of the peculiarities of our wage system has been the systemic inequality between women and men and between some occupational groups and others. Another peculiarity is that the wage system attaches to individual workers and not to the family or the life needs of that worker. That is born of our history. A senator with children or elderly parents to support, or other dependents, earns no more than a senator without dependents. Our occupational group is no different from any other. We do not have a system of family wages.

The means of dealing with this inequity were addressed through child tax exemptions long before the family allowances appeared. The problems with child tax exemptions, of course, are several, but foremost among them is that one has to be paying tax to receive benefits, and many are not. The measures are not, in any way, a visible recognition of the family or of the special role of parents. They are not a positive statement. They carry no message. They come once a year and they do not put any spending power, any money, into the hands of mothers or parents, but only fail to take away less from some than they take from others.

The family allowance, then, has the advantage of providing a strong, positive benefit which recognizes the importance and the additional immediate costs of bringing up children. Family allowances are taxable and if the tax system were as fair and progressive as it could be, the redistributive effect attached to family allowance would be every bit as good as the negative child tax credit. Evidence of this point was brought home forcefully to us by Professor Kitchen from York University. It would be considerably better in that it would not leave out the question of where the child tax credit should be cut, that is, the turning point. As Professor Kitchen pointed out, in countries such as France and in many western European countries, the family allowance is very much larger than it is here. It is taxed and it is an important feature of social security.

Substantial family allowances show the importance which our society attaches to the job and responsibility of being a parent and does not simply attach importance to helping those who are less well off than others, important though that is in itself.

Those of us who disagree with this bill and with the government's child benefits package disagree on several grounds. Philosophically, we believe that the family allowance is a strong, positive measure which shows that Canadians care about families and are willing to put cash into their hands for family expenditures, even if income tax diminishes on an annual basis the family allowance as it does with other money income. Philosophically, we believe that redistribution is essential, but that it should maintain the dignity of the individual which the family allowance does very easily. We also believe that those in need should be supported and that it is intolerable to have children in need of food, shelter and proper care in our prosperous society. In this we are in sympathy with the government's stated intentions of redistributing more money to those with the least income, but we believe that considerably increasing the family allowance on a taxable basis, in addition to the child tax credit, would be a more satisfactory way of helping families in need.

In speaking on second reading of this bill, I argued that this measure was dividing us into socio-economic classes in Canada, something which I believe is pernicious to the stability and future of Canadian society. Partially de-indexing the family allowance will not alone lead to such a state of affairs.

Rather, it indicates a line of argument, a manner of thinking, and, as some of our witnesses put it, "the thin edge of the wedge" for the dismemberment of universal recognition of the importance of children and their parents; a redefinition of poverty and the placing of boundaries around one group of people who are then labelled "poor", with all of the connotations of that label in a capitalist society, with some latent social Darwinist tendencies.

The combination of the benefits package of the child tax credit changes, the early payment of part of the child tax credit, and the partial de-indexing of the family allowance, and reduction of the value of the child tax exemption, does not take human behaviour into account. As some Canadians concerned about this issue have pointed out, it is a "ledger book" approach, where the rights and dignity of the individual, the value of parenthood and families, and the individual equality of Canadians is lost to an accounting procedure that sees a statistical category of "low-income Canadians", or "those most in need"—"whoever they may be" seems to be the rest of that phrase. So we do not like it.

So between Conservatives and Liberals there is a deep rift of this method of approaching child and family benefits. It is not a rift of personalities at all; it is a genuine difference in philosophy about public policy. We are forever reading in the uninformed press that there is no difference between Liberals and Conservatives in what they think and do in relation to policy. That is simply not the case, and this bill demonstrates it. There are fundamental insurmountable differences on this issue. I know that Senator Tremblay is anxious to proceed to further consideration of reform in the area of social security. Senator Graham has indicated that he too perceives this as being necessary. So I am anxious to make these philosophical differences in our approaches quite clear at this point.

As Amy Gutmann, professor of political theory at Princeton University, has described them in her book Liberal Equality, liberals—even modern day North American liberals—start from the premise that all human beings have equal value in their passions and in their reason. Liberal equality in modern day life presses for equality both in participation and in distribution. We may not all deserve the same income, or the same treatment, or the same respect because of the way we work, or don't, behave toward others, and so on, but we are entitled to the opportunities and access to participate in society and to live decently, simply because we are human beings—not because we are poor or rich, and not because of any of our other characteristics.

Because we believe in that philosophy, we believe in the importance of a universal and significant family allowance—"significant" being recognized in terms of its value. We believe that Mila Mulroney should have that family allowance, because quite apart from her other work, her other talents, her opinions, or anything else, she is a mother; and we believe that that family allowance should then be vigorously taxed back from the Mulroney family on the grounds that their income is in the top one per cent of Canadian families.

But we also recognize—regretfully, I must say—that the Canadian people elected a large Conservative majority in the last election. Whether they thought it would lead to the partial de-indexing of their family allowances, I very much doubt, but unfortunately we have no way of knowing that. We must and do respect that vote, and that has constrained the actions of some of us who would very much like to defeat this bill. But we hope that honourable senators will notice that the recommendation attached to the report from the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, read by Senator Tremblay, indicates our very profound unhappiness and disagreement, and expresses the hope that the government will restore full indexing by January 1987.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSALS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 26th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I would like this order to stand until March 26, 1986.

Hon. Jack Marshall: I shall be watching that date!
Order stands.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

PROMPT DELIVERY OF COPIES OF TABLED REPORT TO SENATORS' OFFICES

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, before the Senate adjourns, I should like to raise a point of order. Earlier today the Leader of the Government tabled some reports, among which was the report of the Cape Breton Development Corporation. I am sure that Senator MacEachen and Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) join with me in applauding the Leader of the Government or the Deputy Leader of the Government in seeing that those reports were delivered to our offices, as they should have been, at the proper time. Obviously, someone within the various government departments has come to his senses in ensuring that we do not have to wait for the reports and get them only several days after they reach the offices of the members in the other place.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank Senator Muir. It wasn't easy.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, March 18, 1986, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Tuesday, March 18, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, tabled the committee's twenty-fifth report, approving the supplementary budget of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

(For text of report see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—ACID RAIN—GOVERNMENT OBJECTIVES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government can throw any light on what are the objectives of the Government of Canada with respect to the question of acid rain at the summit that is currently taking place in Washington.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It is expected, honourable senators, that the President and the Prime Minister will make statements on this subject tomorrow. I understand there will be two separate statements, although I cannot confirm that that will actually be the case. However, a statement of the positions will be made public tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: Do I take it that there will be one statement by the Prime Minister and a separate statement by the President on this subject, indicating their different views?

Senator Roblin: I cannot forecast what will be in the statements, but we will know soon enough.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I appreciate the Leader of the Government's telling us that there will be a public pronouncement, but what I really wanted to know is what the government wants out of this meeting in Washington on that subject. In other words, what is the objective of the government?

Senator Roblin: I think that those points will be covered in the statement.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government is, I am sure, being a bit coy. Surely it is not unreasonable to ask what it is that the government has in mind. For example, if there is a pronouncement that acid rain is a trans-boundary problem and if the President acknowledges that fact, as is prominently stated, will the Government of Canada be satisfied?

Senator Roblin: I think we will be pressing the Government of the United States to go as far as we can possibly get them to go on the whole question of acid rain. If one assumes—and that is all I am doing now—that a recognition of the problem is one of the points at issue, then such recognition will certainly be a small step, but I think we are hoping for much more than that. However, I do not think I should give my friend the details of the negotiating position at the present time, particularly since we will get a statement on the matter tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: I must say that I agree with the Leader of the Government when he stated that if all that comes out of the discussion is an acknowledgement that acid rain is a trans-boundary problem, that that indeed would be a very small step. I think the Leader of the Government is being very generous in regarding it as even a "small step." I thought I heard our ambassador in Washington say during a radio interview that that acknowledgement was regarded as an "historic step." I could not believe my ears, and I probably misheard the ambassador, but surely the appointment a year ago of two envoys of the stature of Mr. Davis, the former Premier of Ontario, and Mr. Lewis on this subject was in itself an eloquent acknowledgement that this is a trans-boundary problem. So, to repeat that would be almost offensive to the intelligence of the Canadian people.

What else does the government want? What will it be asking the President in this new intimacy that exists between our Prime Minister and the President? In the words of the Minister of the Environment, who was quoted yesterday as saying, "Now is the time for the payoff." We have given in to the United States on energy, we have given in on foreign investment, we have given in on the crown share, now is the time for the payoff. What, in the government's view, is the "payoff"?

Senator Frith: Let's hear it for the Minister of the Environment.

Senator Roblin: I agree with my honourable friend when he says, "Let's hear it for the Minister of the Environment." He is dedicated to his task, and I rather liked the statement he made. How far we can go towards meeting the points he raised remains to be seen.

I do not wish to be offensive to our ambassador in Washington, but I would not have used the word "historic" to describe the recognition of this as a trans-border question; I certainly agree with my honourable friend on that. I think that has already been fairly well established. I did not raise this particular point—my friend did in his opening statement—but I hope that we can go beyond that. We will have to wait and see.

Senator MacEachen: Of course, we must wait and see, but I am trying to get from the leader what it is the government wants in Washington besides an acknowledgement from the President. What else will the Prime Minister be saying to the President of the United States when he says, "This is what is essential for me to have when I return to Canada"? What else will he be saying?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend and I were to be present at the meeting, we would know the answer to that question, but as we are not, neither of us knows the answer to it.

Senator MacEachen: Am I to take it that these matters are not carefully examined by the cabinet beforehand, that ministers are not involved in laying out the Canadian position?

Senator Frith: Not the Minister of the Environment.

Senator MacEachen: Am I to take it that it is no longer a matter for cabinet consideration, and that even the Leader of the Government in the Senate does not know what the Prime Minister will say?

Is it true, as we read in the press, that this is now a presidential form of government and that everything is decided in the Prime Minister's office and that the ministers have to wait to hear the news accounts from Washington to know what the Prime Minister will be saying on a matter of major importance between our two countries?

Senator Phillips: A speech straight from the heart!

Senator Roblin: If one wants to engage in reflections on a presidential prime ministership, I think that the ice was broken by a previous occupant of that office—not Mr. Turner, but his predecessor. If ever there was a presidential prime ministership, his was it.

I want to say to my honourable friend that he cannot ask questions and expect answers on our negotiating position at this stage of events. I am simply not able to give him that information. We will find out what the facts are when the statements are made tomorrow, and I cannot enlarge on that.

Senator MacEachen: May I put it another way, then? What, in the view of the Canadian government, must be done by the United States to make progress in reducing the hazards of acid rain?

Senator Roblin: These matters are the subject of the discussions. The Prime Minister will be laying them down when he speaks to the President. It would obviously be improper for me to try to conduct that negotiation or give that information now. It will be available tomorrow.

Senator MacEachen: I am not asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate to conduct a negotiation; I am asking what, in the view of the government, is essential in terms of a solution to this problem. I am asking him what has to be done on a co-operative basis. What must Canada do, and what does Canada expect the United States to do?

I think that would have been a legitimate question a week or two weeks ago, because surely the government must have some idea as to what it wants if there is to be a reduction in the hazards of acid rain. What the Leader of the Government is saying is, "I don't know; the government doesn't know, but what we think will be determined in Washington, and then that will be conveyed to the Canadian people."

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend must not let himself get carried away. I am not saying that I don't know; I am not saying that the government doesn't know; and I am not saying that our policy will be determined in Washington, because none of those statements is correct.

Senator MacEachen: Then, the Leader of the Government does know what the position of the Government of Canada is on acid rain; he has acknowledged that. Would he tell us what the position of the Government of Canada is on the question of the resolution of the problem of acid rain with the United States?

Senator Roblin: I tell my friend again that this will be covered by the Prime Minister tomorrow and I am certainly not going to upstage him.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I must protest at the inability of the Leader of the Government to tell us anything about the policy of the Government of Canada. He does not know; that is clear. He has not been involved, his colleagues have not been involved, and they do not know what the Prime Minister is going to put up before the President. Obviously, they do not know.

Senator Roblin: My friend can speculate on that all he likes, but I tell him that he is wrong.

Senator Frith: Well, then, tell us what is the position.

AGRICULTURE

WORLD GRAIN PRICES—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR WHEAT

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate in the same general sphere, but concerning a different particular.

Grain producers in Canada are very concerned about the United States trade policy with regard to the export of grain. There is a major move by the United States treasury to reduce international prices for grain by way of offering grain on the world market free of charge, by way of reducing their own loan rate until this, in fact, does lower world grain prices.

Is the Prime Minister putting forth a Canadian position on the international trade in grain, and is the Prime Minister endeavouring to get the United States, in co-operation with Canada, to adopt policies that will strengthen the price of grain rather than to follow the narrow policies outlined so far by the American administration, which will wreak havoc in Canada and in the grain markets of the world?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The answer is yes, honourable senators.

Senator Argue: When is the initial price for wheat likely to be announced? Spring is around the corner and the planting season is coming. This is the time that, ordinarily, the initial prices are announced. Will the government, as part of its policy, put the treasury of this country behind the wheat producers in Canada as the American treasury is being put behind, and in support of the American grain producers, or is the policy going to be that the Canadian wheat producer has to accept the world price and will get nothing more?

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend is making a lot of requests for statements of policy about which I do not intend to reply. These matters are under review and, if any proposals are to be made, they will be placed in the public arena for discussion—and I am not saying that they will be.

With respect to the question of the initial payment, that will be announced in the usual course at about the usual time.

Senator Argue: Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate prepared to make his position clear—and the honourable leader has made his position clear on a number of things in the past—that the full expected drop in international prices should not be borne by the Canadian wheat producers in the initial prices that are established?

Senator Roblin: The question of initial prices is a matter to be decided by my colleague. I can make no comment on that.

Senator Argue: Is it no longer a decision that is made by the cabinet? Is it a decision that is made by one colleague? I believe it is a cabinet decision and the initial prices are established by the cabinet.

Senator Roblin: My friend is correct in that.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, we all know that the Minister of State for Youth represented the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport at the opening ceremonies of the 1986 Arctic Winter Games on Sunday, March 16. Of course, we all wish northerners the very best of success with their games.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: When will the Minister of State for Youth quit hopping from game to game, pinch-hitting for other ministers? When will she tackle the more fundamental problems affecting youth in this country? Indeed, when will the government tell that minister to come out of the deep freeze and start writing a real youth development policy along the lines suggested by the Special Senate Committee on Youth?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend can express his views on that, but I do not think I would care to make any comment.

Senator Corbin: That is a very disappointing comment in itself. The country is crying for the government to come forward with credible development policy proposals—credible alternatives.

So far, we have had a Youth minister who, last year, was hopping from place to place selling—and I suppose she could give some time to it—International Youth Year. We all know that the problems facing youth in this country are serious ones. Certainly, one of our colleagues is doing his best to arouse the sympathy of the government to that fact.

Why would the Minister of State for Youth continue traveling from one end of the country to the other when, indeed, she should sit down, develop a credible policy and then try to sell it to her cabinet colleagues and the rest of the country? Why is that not happening? Why would a minister spend so much time going from one place to another when we have these crying needs in the country? That I cannot understand.

Senator Roblin: Without attempting in any way to minimize the problem of youth unemployment in the country, because it is a very serious one, I assure my friend that he can take some comfort in the fact that there has been a substantial decline in unemployment as it affects the youthful section of the population in the past few months. The rate of unemployment has gone down by about 2 per cent, and about 50,000 more young people are employed. I do not give that statistic to indicate, by any means, that we are satisfied with that situation, because we certainly are not and the matter is being carefully considered.

We have the report on youth which the Honourable Senator Hébert presented in this chamber recently and, when the Senate debates it, I am sure it will also receive consideration by the government to see what useful ideas can be extracted from it to help the situation.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CENTRAL AMERICA—USE OF MILITARY FORCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to ask whether the Government of Canada has a policy with respect to the use of armed force in Central America and whether it has a policy on the efforts of the United States to escalate the military situation in Central America by the provision of very substantial additional support to armed groups in that area.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, covered that question when he responded to a similar question in the House of Commons not too long ago when he said that our thrust in the Central American situation was to support, as far as we can, not only with words, but also with money—because we have programs there—the Contadora process which is aimed at bringing about a peaceful solution to the problems in that area and does not contemplate the use of military force. I think that remains our constant position.

Senator MacEachen: I am pleased by the comment made by the Leader of the Government, because neither the Deputy Prime Minister nor the Secretary of State for External Affairs was prepared, in the House of Commons, to go as far as the Leader of the Government in the Senate has gone by saying that Canada opposes the use of military force in the solution of the problems of Central America. I agree with that. I think it is a sound policy. I wish the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs had made that very clear because, even yesterday, the churches were asking the Prime Minister to clarify that point.

What I really want to know is whether the Prime Minister will tell the President that Canadian policy is directly opposed to his efforts to provide additional military strength in Central America.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that in my statement I have gone an inch beyond what is recognized as the policy of the government. I would be surprised, indeed, if I had. I do not think that it will come as any news to President Reagan to know that we have a different point of view on the matter.

Senator MacEachen: That is the problem—the Government of Canada is timid in making its foreign policy views known to the United States. Surely we ought to do more than say, “Well, it should come as no surprise.” Is there not an obligation on the Prime Minister to explain to the President why we disagree with the policy of the United States in Central America and, let us hope, to influence his decisions? His policy—namely, the escalation of military force—is one which neither the former government nor the present government supports. My question is: Is it the intention of the Prime Minister to make that a point in his conversations with the President?

Senator Roblin: I have every expectation that that is correct.

Senator MacEachen: I appreciate that indication and I hope that the Leader of the Government will tell us, after the summit, exactly how the matter came up, whether the Prime Minister did make the point and what was the response of the President. I believe that it is important that Canada maintain its record of developing its own foreign policy and of not automatically accepting the foreign policy of the United States. On this question our views are clearly divergent from those of the United States and we ought to make that clear. I will be asking the Leader of the Government for a report on the matter.

Senator Roblin: I shall be pleased to provide a report on this because I agree with my honourable friend that we are making our own foreign policy. Whether we disagree with all of our allies or agree with them, we will make our own foreign policy. As my friend knows, this is not the first occasion on which we have had independent views to express, and I suspect that it will not be the last.

Senator MacEachen: I agree with what the Leader of the Government has said, but I was dismayed by a statement attributed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and then repeated by the Deputy Prime Minister, that Canada was likely to lose its influence if it expressed views contrary to those of the United States; that that would be regarded as unsolicited and gratuitous advice. Therefore, I welcome the stiffening of the attitude shown by the Leader of the Government, which was not shown by the Secretary of State for External Affairs or by the Deputy Prime Minister, who, presumably, wanted to express these views in Canada but did not want to take the extra step and express them directly to the American administration. That is what the churches and other groups expect the government to do. I will come back to the leader on this matter later.

Senator Roblin: One has to leave it to the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to decide the way in which they will express their views to the authorities in the United States. There is more than one way to skin a cat.

Senator Frith: Would that we could treat them as cats to be skinned on this issue.

MIDDLE EAST—MISSION OF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, related to these foreign affairs matters, my question has to do with the announced trip of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the Middle East. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether there is any proposal on the part of the government and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to amend existing and established bilateral policy with respect to Arab-Israeli matters during the course of his visit. In particular, is there any intention on the part of that mission to meet with or engage in any way with the PLO?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that the mission is an exploratory one. I have not in my possession the agenda which indicates the people with whom the Secretary of State will meet. I presume—and this is only a presumption—that he will probably meet with the same set of people that the Senate committee met with when it visited the same area two years ago.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

APPOINTMENT OF CANADIAN AMBASSADOR TO IRELAND— APPLICATION OF CODE OF CONDUCT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to raise a point with respect to the delayed answer which the Leader of the Government was good enough to give me on March 5 with respect to the appointment of a Canadian ambassador to Ireland. Earlier I had read to the Senate comments made by Mr. McDermott following his appointment as ambassador. Some were of a partisan nature and others had to do with voluntary organizations in Canada. I asked whether this was acceptable—

● (1420)

Senator Roblin:—behaviour.

Senator MacEachen:—behaviour. I thank the Leader of the Government. I appreciate his interest. However, I must say that the reply finesses the problem, because it states:

It is not appropriate for Canadian Ambassadors to comment as described.

All representatives of Canada are governed by the Code of Conduct Guidelines.

So far that seems clear enough. But then it goes on to say:

While Mr. McDermott has been appointed Ambassador-designate to Ireland, he has not yet presented his letter of credentials to the Irish government, nor assumed such responsibilities.

It is the Department's understanding that Mr. McDermott will do so upon his official arrival in Dublin in May...

My question is: Does the Code of Conduct apply from the moment the ambassador is appointed, or does it apply only upon his arrival in Ireland in May; and, in the meantime, is he free to speak as anyone can speak, that is, as a private citizen?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, without having the benefit of the departmental brief at my disposal, I would hazard a guess that the rules respecting ambassadors apply from the date of appointment. But I would be prepared to allow Mr. McDermott a little time to learn the ropes of his new job, and I really do not think that we can expect him to make any further statements that might prove to be objectionable to my friend.

YOUTH

DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, intituled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Yuzyk).

Hon. Paul Yuzyk: Honourable senators, the problems of youth in general had never been of special concern to the Canadian Parliament until recently. It was the large-scale unemployment of our youth, causing much suffering among the young people, that attracted the attention of the leaders of our country, and voices were heard during the election and in Parliament asking for remedial action.

In attempting to deal with this embarrassing situation, the federal government recently established a Youth ministry, and during 1985, which was celebrated throughout the world as International Youth Year, this new ministry sponsored and financed a large number of programs and activities for youth across Canada under the supervision of a 24-member youth advisory council. In the course of my remarks on this subject, I shall be using sub-headings. The first is:

Functioning of the Senate.

It was the Senate, however, that decided to conduct at the federal level, for the first time in our history, an in-depth study of the important problems facing youth today. The Special Senate Committee on Youth was originally established in April 1984 but was dissolved when the federal election was called in June and, finally, was re-established in December of that year. The committee consisted of 12 members—eight males and four females—of various origins, backgrounds and experiences, representing the regions of Canada. All have a keen interest in the welfare of our youth.

In April 1985 the committee issued an invitation to young Canadians, youth organizations, organizations working for youth, and government officials to submit written briefs. In May and June the committee toured the provincial capitals and other large centres where the submitted briefs were discussed. New ones were collected and oral presentations were heard. Some of the best briefs and presentations came from university student bodies and from youth leaders trained within the government-financed Katimavik program. Experts from various fields associated with youth problems, some from the U.S.A., were called to give testimony. Successful youth programs in the U.S.A., the United Kingdom, Austria, West Germany and Sweden were studied.

As a result, a report dealing with problems of Canadian youth between the ages of 15 and 24 and proposed solutions was tabled in the Senate on February 19. The first 15,000 copies were quickly snapped up across Canada, and to meet the growing demand the printing of another 10,000 copies was approved. Senator Jacques Hébert explained the work of the committee and the recommendations of the unanimous report in the chamber on March 13. He made an enthusiastic appeal for fast action in order to save our youth.

Concerns of Canadian Youth.

We know that the majority of young Canadians in the adolescent age group is busy getting an education or holding down a job. They are concerned with the sombre realities of the eighties, the threat of nuclear war, youth unemployment, the destruction of the environment and the complicated and frustrating problems of Third World nations. They also have their own concerns which directly affect their own lives—that is, education and employment. Many issues and concerns that were discussed by the youth at the committee's hearings fall within the mandate of governments. For example, social services for youth with personal problems, concerns about the various education systems and problems with job training and work.

We are convinced that solutions do exist to combat the problems of youth. These problems are sometimes created—or at least augmented—by social and economic decisions taken by governments. They must be solved, not only for reasons of social justice, but because these problems will continue to grow and cause distress and violence in our society.

Saving the "Lost Generation".

Since most of the witnesses who appeared before the committee focused on specific problems that they were experiencing, this report concentrates primarily on the approximately one-quarter of all youth between the ages of 15 and 24 who are more or less directionless. Entitled "A Plan of Action", the report presents 26 recommendations on how to alleviate the problems of Canadian youth. It is our firm belief that through vigorous and concerted action on the part of governments, the co-operation of youth organizations, and of those bodies and institutions involved with youth, this "lost generation" can still be saved and find a useful place in our society. While we were unable to establish a direct relationship between youth unemployment and the upsurge in alcohol and drug abuse, prostitution, suicide and delinquent behaviour in general, the members of the committee concluded that while unemployment may not be the only cause of these problems, it is nonetheless a leading one. It must be remembered that the leading cause of both youth and adult unemployment is a shortage of over one million jobs in this country, rather than the personal characteristics of the unemployed. We are mindful that over 630,000 are classified as unemployed. This very high figure includes 500,000 youth noted by Statistics Canada and over 130,000 others who, having despaired of finding work, have simply stopped looking and are, therefore, not included in the official statistics. This is the "lost generation" that must be saved.

● (1430)

In focusing attention on what were identified as the major problems of Canada's youth, four areas were singled out: the changing lifestyle and values of youth in Canadian society; native youth; the transition from school to work, and employment and unemployment. Thus, the committee's report is arbitrarily divided into four chapters.

The Place of Youth in Canadian Society.

In chapter one, we examined the interaction between youth and social institutions with which they deal. An overview of the social characteristics of young people concentrates on their attitudes and behaviour, as well as the changing expectations of the family, the school and the workplace. The work of community, social and health services for youth is outlined. Housing, sexuality, eating disorders, suicide, smoking, alcohol consumption, illegal drug use and law enforcement are issues of particular importance. We applaud the efforts of youth who wish to establish their own institutions such as advisory councils, lobby groups of youth and youth television networks to make their voice heard.

The committee concludes that young people must participate fully in existing government, political, social, economic and educational institutions, and that these institutions, now managed by adults, must openly encourage youth involvement. Young people are concerned with the implementation of democracy and with maintaining and promoting Canada's multicultural and bilingual identity. Some spoke with pride about Canada's multicultural and bilingual identity; some spoke with pride about Canada's cultural and linguistic variety and stressed the need for school curricula which would reflect the social, political, economic and cultural variation in our country. We believe that young Canadians should be aware of their rights and freedoms, guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms of the new Canadian Constitution of 1982.

Native Youth.

Although the mandate of our committee did not include a study of native youth, we had a Canadian of Indian origin, Senator Len Marchand, on the committee and two Canadians of Inuit origin, Senators Willie Adams and Charlie Watt, participating in the meetings. Therefore, we felt obliged to assume some responsibility for the members of Canada's First Nations as well. Chapter two is devoted to this subject.

The difficulties facing young people across Canada are even more pressing in the case of native youth. Housing, cultural clashes, suicide, crime, and drug and alcohol abuse need urgent attention. In response to this need, recent initiatives of native people themselves have addressed problems in the areas of health, legal issues, education and government. Our recommendations reflect our belief that the native people can themselves best identify and solve the problems affecting them. I am sure that at least one of the above-mentioned three senators will join this debate and speak on the difficult problems of native youth.

From School to Work.

Chapter three presents the committee's views on education, training and work experience. In the transition period from school to work, education and employment cannot be considered as two separate, unrelated entities. The choice of courses and programs that students make in school influences their future work. Our committee commends the successful training and apprenticeship programs undertaken in some European countries and proposes similar, though modified, initiatives in Canada. We endorse the recommendations of the Johnson report on the funding of post-secondary education.

We are, of course, aware of the fact that education and training are matters of provincial and, at times, joint provincial and federal jurisdiction. That is why our recommendations are generally addressed to governments for the next three decades. We call upon the federal and provincial governments to recognize their respective areas of jurisdiction, and to accept their responsibilities by joining their efforts to fulfil a common objective. Addressing the situation of youth in the 1980s must be done as soon as possible and by every available means. I believe that someone will deal with this chapter and the recommendations more fully.

Employment and Unemployment.

The final chapter probes the issues of youth employment and unemployment as the sources of the greatest concern for our young people. Our study of this problem convinced us that the situation can no longer be tolerated and that immediate, innovative steps must be taken to find work for over 630,000 young Canadians who suffer from a disproportionate level of unemployment, as compared with adults. Inadequate training and education serve as barriers to finding work. Demographic forecasts show that unemployment among young people will remain high over the next few decades. This is especially true for young people in eastern Canada, for handicapped youth, or those with learning disabilities and for those with low levels of education.

In this chapter, we discuss a number of potential solutions to youth unemployment, and look at successful examples in other countries. Our committee makes a number of recommendations, none of which is a panacea in itself, but, if implemented as a whole through immediate and concerted action, the situation of our youth would improve greatly and the "lost generation" could be saved.

Bleak Prospects for Youth Employment.

In addition to suffering from a disproportionately high level of joblessness (16.5 per cent for 1985, as opposed to the national adult rate of 8.7 per cent), Canadian young people between the ages of 15 and 24 are the first hired and the last hired, are more easily shunted into part-time jobs and are frequently victims of the "ten-week syndrome", in other words, periods of short-term employment which qualify them solely for the next stint of Unemployment Insurance. Recent studies shatter the myths that young people are lazy, lack a concrete sense of the value of work and enjoy being "taken care of" by the state. Findings of the survey of youth attitudes carried out in June 1983 by Goldfarb Consultants show that young people are surprisingly realistic in their appraisal of current jobs prospects. Of those who were employed, most were satisfied with their jobs—81 per cent—while "being successful" and "having a job" were two of the highest priorities. They were willing to be flexible in order to adapt to an ever-changing market, be it through further education or retraining programs.

Unemployment statistics and labour force analyses only take into account those Canadians who are employed or who are actively seeking work. The hidden thousands of people, young and old, who have given up on Canada Employment Centres and the full-time, yet fruitless, task of job-hunting often resort to other means of earning at least some money. We see youth taking to the streets offering services such as hairdressing, mending, mechanical repairs, painting, babysitting and other odd jobs. Some young people follow adults into the drug traffic trade, prostitution and theft to procure money, even though that choice cuts them off from the mainstream of society.

Canadian economy projections of the Macdonald Commission and the Conference Board report indicate that unemployment will remain high in this country through the year 2010 unless structural changes occur. This model shows that the current group of 15 to 24-year olds may well carry their unemployment problem with them as they age, which means that they will be unable to find a job during their lifetimes. High rates of unemployment for youth will continue. The proportion of young unemployed people will decrease somewhat because the proportion of 15 to 24-year olds will decrease, but the absolute numbers of young unemployed will not decrease.

Proposals to Alleviate Youth Unemployment.

In order to help the youth in their desperate situation, the committee is concerned that the deficit reduction should not be achieved at the expense of the unemployed youth. It is gratifying to note that the current government has taken this into account in its recent budget. The committee believes that Canada has much to learn from other countries where significant reduction in unemployment has been achieved by providing the jobless with a decent minimum income and offering temporary employment training programs and recycling programs in response to the real needs of the labour force.

The committee recommends:

—that the government examine the possibility of adapting to Canadian conditions and experience some training and apprenticeship programs which have been successful in West Germany, Austria and Sweden. These are obligatory, involve co-operation between schools and business, and give young people the paid status of apprentices within business establishments.

Governments and large businesses will necessarily have to join efforts to guarantee financing for small businesses, in particular those set up by young people. The committee recommends, therefore, that various levels of government establish or promote the establishment of foundations headed by people knowledgeable about business. The funds in these foundations should be used to finance small businesses launched by young persons and to provide advice on business techniques.

Better Use of Unemployment Insurance.

Committee members studied the benefits, effects and implications of unemployment insurance. Benefits of the UI amounted to about $12 billion in 1985, a large part of the national deficit. Without reducing these benefits, which perform a safety-net function, they could be put to use to generate long-term employment. There are apparently some abuses in the UI scheme and we, therefore, welcome the re-examination of the scheme. We, however, propose an additional way of using UI benefits, which is now practised in several European OECD countries. There, employees who have worked for some appreciable time in established enterprises often launched their own successful ventures, suggesting that entrepreneurship is not innate, but is learned by studying masters of the art.

The committee recommends that legislation concerning unemployment insurance and social assistance benefits be amended so that the federal government could subsidize the wages of new trainees previously receiving UI benefits and thus encourage employers to hire jobless youth. This system could also be used to finance government public works. Unemployment insurance recipients could start their businesses with unemployment insurance or social assistance money and continue to receive benefits without disqualification for a period of 52 weeks, this initial period being the most crucial in the life of a new business.

Part-time and Volunteer Work.

To meet the urgent needs of unemployed Canadians, there were suggestions to reduce the work week and increase part-time work. Keeping in mind that by the end of this century one of every four workers will be employed on a part-time basis, which would deprive employees of adequate wages and benefits, we feel that all workers should be entitled to equal prorated benefits and no one category of employees should have to accept only part-time work. The committee recommends that the government launch urgent pilot projects to test the feasibility of work sharing and job sharing as a means of increasing youth employment.

The celebration of International Youth Year in 1985 in Canada brought to our attention the importance of international youth co-operation. Considering how important it is for our country to increase its contacts with the Third World and to co-operate in its development, considering how beneficial it would be to our society to have as many Canadians as possible attuned to world problems, and considering that we have a pool of young Canadians with diplomas and some experience who are unable to find jobs, the committee believes that Canada should provide as many as possible with an opportunity to work for a period of two years in a Third World country. The committee recommends that the government, acting through CIDA, take steps to allow non-governmental organizations to train and ensure presence in the Third World of as many youth volunteers as those countries require. The government should also promote youth exchanges, particularly with Third World countries.

Assessment of the Katimavik Program.

Of all the youth that appeared before our committee in the hearings across Canada, it was the young people who were trained under a national youth program called Katimavik that made the strongest impression on us. These young men and women were most articulate in presenting the problems and concerns of the young generation and unquestionably displayed the fine qualities of leadership that are so needed in our country at this time. We studied the Katimavik program, which has been in operation for ten years, and came to the conclusion that it was a positive and constructive force in Canadian society, even though costly.

The committee looked at similar programs in the U.S.A. During the period of the Great Depression from 1933 to 1942, President Roosevelt conducted a national work program, the American Civilian Conservation Corps, which employed 2.5 million people. Some states and large cities have set up their own programs, the biggest being the California Conservation Corps, with 1,800 participants. In March 1984 San Francisco launched the San Francisco Conservation Corps and a few months later Mayor Ed Koch of New York created the National Service Corporation.

The Senate committee proposes a more ambitious program than its American counterparts—"that the government establish a Young Canadians' Community Service Program, open to all Canadians aged 17 to 24, either by using Katimavik as a model or by giving Katimavik, now a non-government organization funded by the Secretary of State, the means to expand." The Young Canadians' Community Service Program should be designed not only for job-creating purposes but also as training for various community services and leadership.

It was most unfortunate, however, that the government decided to cancel the Katimavik program a week before the Senate Youth report was tabled. Senator Hébert, a founder of the Katimavik program, was greatly incensed, stating that the government could have waited for the Youth report before announcing its decision. After appealing to Prime Minister Mulroney, with no response, Senator Hébert at noon on March 10 went on a hunger strike in the rotunda of the chamber, where he remains to the present day. I am glad he is here with us in the chamber today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Zuzyk: In the meantime, the Prime Minister has replied to Senator Hébert, stating that:

Katimavik had been channelling a significant level of financial resources towards a relatively small segment of the youth population.

He announced that the government would—and I quote again:

make more effective use of this money to benefit a wider cross-section of youth.

And:

...that instead of spending money on make-work projects, the greater need is to focus scarce dollars on building the permanent job market for Canadian youth.

Further, the Prime Minister stated that the government —has committed $700 million directly to youth employment and job training programs at a time when we have been forced to reduce government spending to deal with the deficit and national debt we inherited ... some 219,000 young Canadians will benefit from employment related programs in the current fiscal year.

Now my position as Deputy Chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Youth is the following. I believe that the government should have waited a week for the report of the committee before making its announcement to cancel the Katimavik program.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: The committee unanimously approved the recommendation that the government establish a Young Canadians' Community Service Program. By cancelling Katimavik, I expect that the government will have a better, more far-reaching and effective program in its place in the very near future.

Youth Action Councils.

Finally, the committee recommends the creation of youth action councils in all Canadian communities, and the establishment of a non-government body to promote and co-ordinate the activities of these local councils and to provide information on youth related issues. These councils would be easy to organize and could be financed at the community level. This would prove to young people generally and to the unemployed youth in particular that they could count on the understanding and support of the adults and the institutions around them. Moreover, an active youth council could complement the local employment centre and stimulate it to provide better and more personalized service for young people. It has already proven to be successful in many places, for example, Oromocto in New Brunswick, the Industry-Education Council in Hamilton and Frontiers Foundation in Toronto. Local communities should continue to play the protagonist's role, supported by provincial governments and the federal Ministry of State for Youth.

All-Canadian Solution.

Despite the economic recession from which we are barely recovering, Canada is one of the richest countries in the world. We have at our disposal the means by which to help our young people. The political and public will to remedy the situation must be displayed without further delay.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Yuzyk: Each Canadian community must assume control of its own affairs and put its imagination to work so that we may improve the present and future lives of our young people. All Canadians should treat the deplorable situation of our youth as the acute national crisis that it is, and concentrate their energies collectively to overcome this serious problem.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I would like to ask Senator Yuzyk a question. Did the committee consider the effect of abolishing mandatory retirement on youth unemployment?

Senator Yuzyk: Yes, the committee did. I hope that honourable senators have looked at and have studied this report. I was not able to give you all the details, but I did, however, concentrate on the most important ones and you will find your answer by reading this report.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

"(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees."—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I wish to defer to the Honourable Senator David, who will speak at this time.

Hon. Paul D. David: I thank you most warmly, Senator McElman, for permitting me to speak on this motion at this time.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, as a physician and cardiologist, I am certainly not going to object to the motion of Senator Frith or to the bill presented by Senator Haidasz, prohibiting the use of tobacco in Senate committee rooms. I am sufficiently embarrassed as it is about confessing to my habit in public.

Quite frankly, I was fed up with my daily attempts to stop smoking. One day, my subconscious decided in favour of a perhaps shorter but at least happier life. Who knows, the measures you are proposing may provide a new incentive for me to butt out!

I cannot disagree with the statistics that show a clear connection between smoking and lung cancer in smokers. However, Senator Frith, I think the connection is far less obvious in the case of those breathing sidestream smoke. The statistics for this group sometimes contradict each other and are often not significant. Nevertheless, tobacco smoke is, I agree, one of the many causes of pollution in the air we breathe.

That being said, I am glad to see a substantial decrease in smoking among Canadians, which demonstrates the beneficial impact of education. Because of health reasons, pressure by non-smokers and increasingly heavy excise taxes, smoking is slowly but surely dying out. In fact, I have noticed an increasingly aggressive attitude towards smokers. I must say that I find the dogmatic approach, in medicine or anywhere else, vastly irritating. In fact, in medicine there are far fewer certainties than uncertainties. This is where medicine is on a par with other fields of activity that combine human and scientific knowledge. I think we would have to include economics and politics.

Heart disease (angina pectoris, coronary thrombosis) is, as you know, the worst killer on this continent, whether we are talking about the U.S. or Canada. Several risk factors have been identified in an attempt to explain this phenomenon. One of these factors is smoking. The other factors are a diet rich in cholesterol, sedentary lifestyle, high blood pressure and diabetes. Stress is often mentioned, but since it cannot be measured, it cannot be quantified in scientific articles. Everybody talks about it, and no wonder. Of course it is hard to do much about heredity.

However, even when we know all these risk factors and heredity is good, we still see young individuals, especially males, who do not smoke, get lots of exercise and are not obese, suffering a heart attack at a relatively young age, at least younger than average. Why?

We know that alcohol is an important risk factor for a number of diseases, and this aside from the psychological and social disruption and the disruption to families. However, the commercials are all over our television screens... Can we go on tolerating this situation?

And how are we going to prevent all the psychosomatic illnesses that account for 50 per cent of visits to the doctor's office? We know these are caused by any number of factors and could be cured by a better and healthier family, psychological and job environment.

So there are many factors that can cause, aggravate or prolong disease. And there are a lot more factors we do not know about. However, the fact remains that even if we did manage to eliminate all these factors, which is wishful thinking, humans would still, be it at a later age, succumb to an identifiable and total disease.

Yesterday, it was senior citizens. Today, we are one step further. Perhaps tomorrow we will be talking about immortality.

To get back to smoking, the situation has changed a great deal in twenty years. As you know, honourable senators, at meetings of all kinds, smokers are gradually becoming the exception, and that is a good thing. We see the same thing happening in trains and aircraft, where the smoking section has been gradually shrinking from year to year. Usually, the smoking section is in the rear.

Don't you have the impression, honourable senators, that the problem is solving itself? A ban on smoking will of course add official approval to a virtue that has practically become compulsory. Personally, I prefer virtues one acquires as a result of persuasion rather than imposing bans. I think the former attitude is more tolerant, more compassionate and perhaps also more sincere.

That being said, I wish people would be more inclined to let time take care of the few smokers who may die as a result of their habit and replace them with serene non-smokers who will meet the same fate at a later age, as a result of more mysterious causes.

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator David. Would he suggest that we permit smoking in the Senate chamber? If we are to continue the practice in committee rooms, what is the difference between a committee room and the Senate chamber?

[Translation]

Senator David: Certainly not; I am a disciplinarian. However, I think discipline has its limits. I think we are being slightly intolerant with people who have weaknesses.

[English]

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, I have been the brunt of a fair amount of good-natured ribbing from some of my colleagues with respect to this motion and my habit of smoking.

I was one of those who grew up in the depression years when one of the vices I learned was to smoke. I started smoking at the age of 14 and have been a continuous smoker since—that is, for 51 years.

Senator Marshall: And you are still living!

Senator McElman: Senator Marshall has much greater fortitude and control than I. He has quit—for the moment at least. I have had occasion to tell him, during some of his much more obdurate times, that I wished he would take it up again.

In any event, having smoked for all of those years, some ten years ago my doctor—who was also a beloved friend of mine and who has since passed on to his reward—convinced me that my consumption of cigarettes—then some three packs a day on a normal day and four packs a day under pressure—was a bit much. My health had deteriorated somewhat. I took his advice and I quit smoking cigarettes, cold turkey. It was quite an experience. Three days later, at breakfast, my good wife said to me, “Good morning, Charles,” and I replied, “What do you mean?” and was ready to do battle. Her response was, “For goodness sake, get out your old pipes and start smoking again; you're intolerable.” As some of my colleagues know, I am not too tolerable at any time, but I was truly intolerable at that time. I am still a smoker. I do appreciate the feeling of some honourable senators who have given up the awful habit that they are suffering from the effects of secondary smoke. Although I am, on occasion, inclined to think to myself that there is no sinner like a reformed sinner, I try to push that thought behind me. I do appreciate that there is a sincere concern on the part of many about the effects within confined quarters of secondary smoke.

I do not wish to either gather or use in debate arguments against the intent of this motion. I suggest, however, to the mover of this motion, that we follow the procedure that has long been established in the Senate. Rather than having this motion brought to a vote in the Senate at large, perhaps it would be useful and appropriate that the debate be concluded, the motion withdrawn and the matter referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders so that all of the implications of the motion can be considered in some depth by that committee, after which its report and recommendations will come to the Senate for consideration.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, unless anyone else wishes to speak to the motion at this time, I accept the suggestion of Senator McElman. I think that that is the proper procedure to follow. I would like to take a moment, however, to say that this motion has produced some interesting side effects—to make a bit of a pun—one of which was a series of interesting cartoons on the subject which has been collected by Senator McElman. One of them in particular has a remote connection with the intervention of Senator David. It depicted a railway passenger car or a bus—I was not clear which—in which many people were smoking. One very annoyed pipe or cigar smoker was saying to a young woman opposite him, who was the only person not smoking, “Miss, this is a smoking area so either light up or get out!”

Honourable senators, I suggest that the minutes show that there is an amendment to the effect that the motion be not now adopted, but that its subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for study, report and recommendation.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think that that is acceptable, but I suggest that somebody else move the amendment.

Senator Roblin: You cannot amend your own motion.

Senator Frith: No, but I can accept such an amendment.

Senator McElman: If it is acceptable to the Senate, could it be considered that I have moved that amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.”

In amendment, it is moved by the Honourable Senator McElman, seconded by the Honourable Senator Argue, P.C., that the motion be not now adopted, but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for consideration and report.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion in amendment agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL FINANCE

TABLING OF COMMITTEE REPORT

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Leblanc was to have tabled the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance respecting Supplementary Estimates (C). I understand that Senator Leblanc has been detained but will join us presently. I would ask permission to revert to Reports of Committees when Senator Leblanc is present.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Is the report ready?

Senator Doody: Yes. In fact, honourable senators, the research assistant to the committee and the clerk of the committee are outside the chamber. They told me that Senator Leblanc has approved the report and they are waiting for him to sign it.

Senator Frith: Could the deputy chairman not table the report?

Senator Doody: He is not present either.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

AGRICULTURE

WORLD GRAIN PRICES—INITIAL PAYMENT FOR WHEAT

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, the two most important subjects for the economy of western Canada, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate knows, are the international market for grain, especially wheat, and international energy prices. I wonder if the Leader of the Government could tell us—after having had the time to think it over carefully since the questions were raised by Senator Argue yesterday—whether this matter will be raised by the Prime Minister with the President of the United States. I ask this because the consequence appears now that wheat will go down to approximately $2.30 (U.S.) by the time the harvest is over.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I share my honourable friend's concern about the developments in respect of this matter. They are very worrisome for all Canadians, including myself.

My understanding is that the matter was on the agenda for the meeting of the President and the Prime Minister. Whether it was actually dealt with or not, I cannot say. I think I gave an undertaking to the Senate yesterday to find out what I could about this matter and to report to the chamber today.

Senator Olson: The leader has given an undertaking to advise the chamber as soon as he can. However, there are many farmers in western Canada who would like to know about this two or three weeks before seeding time so that they will know whether or not Canada has a reasonable chance of having a market that will return a profit rather than facing the prospect of a loss for this season.

Senator Roblin: Canada can raise the issue, but the answer has to come from the other side. I cannot give any assurance as to when that will happen.

Senator Olson: There is one other thing Canada can do, and that is set the initial price at a reasonable level. When I talk about a "reasonable level", I mean a break-even level, or thereabouts. I realize that the discussions between the President of the United States and Canada's Prime Minister will have a very significant bearing on this, and that is really what I was asking about.

Senator Roblin: Well, I hope that is the case. I do know that in order to make some contribution to the western provinces under the Western Grain Stabilization Act, there is a possibility of an interim spring payment being made, and that is to be given urgent consideration.

Hon. Hazen Argue: I heard on the news the statement that was made in the other place, but I would like to ask this question: Is the prospective payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Act likely to be as much as it was last year or is it likely to be a lot less? If it is likely to be a lot less, is the government giving any consideration whatsoever to putting the treasury of Canada behind the initial payment, behind the western producers, at least to a modest extent, when the mammoth treasury of the United States has been put behind their producers by way of a guaranteed loan price and, more importantly, by way of a guaranteed target price? Is the government giving any thought whatsoever to risking anything from the treasury to support the price of wheat in Canada for Canadian wheat producers?

Senator Roblin: My friend is asking a series of hypothetical questions based on whatever amount is finally decided, but as in the case of the interim spring payment, we will have to wait and see what that is.

Senator Argue: Is the government giving any consideration whatsoever to the possibility of maintaining for wheat next year the initial prices that are currently in effect? Has any thought whatsoever been given to doing that?

Senator Roblin: Well, of course the government is giving thought to that matter, but there are two subjects that have to be considered in that connection: one is the advance under the Western Grain Stabilization Fund; and the other is the setting of the initial payment. Both of those very important matters are now under consideration.

Senator Argue: Well, I would have to protest as a farmer, and as a senator, that there should be absolutely no relationship between what the farmer gets from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund, which is his money, and what the treasury may do about holding up the initial price for wheat. I can see no connection whatsoever between the two, and I am sure the government leader is aware that if the initial price goes down, the farmers' contributions will be going down—all other things being equal—and the payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Fund will be less and less.

As a further question, has the minister done any formal consulting, or does he have a policy of consulting, with farm organizations who are concerned about the initial price before the price is in fact set, or before his recommendation goes to cabinet?

Senator Roblin: Well, my friend is right in saying that there is no connection between the payment under the Western Grain Stabilization Fund and the initial payment. I hope I gave him no reason to think that I thought there was a connection, because there is none. They are two separate entities. That is the point that I was trying to make. With respect to consultation, the minister consults more widely with western farmers than some ministers I have known in the past—and I am not talking about my honourable friend.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Argue: Well then, to be more specific, has the minister sat down and discussed this question with representatives of the wheat pool organizations, the United Grain Growers, and the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, or any part of those organizations that I have named?

Senator Roblin: Well, my honourable friend knows that I have no means of answering that question during Question Period. I will have to take it as notice.

Senator Argue: I appreciate the minister's taking my question as notice, but to the extent that consideration of such matters is part of the cabinet process, and since it falls within the scope of committees dealing with economic questions, it seems to me that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should be kept informed on these questions really on a day-to-day basis.

Senator Roblin: I think anyone who follows my replies in this house will do me the courtesy of recognizing that, as a rule, I am informed on a wide variety of subjects of which I have no direct knowledge since I am a minister without portfolio. It is rather unbecoming of my honourable friend to make a remark of that kind. I tell him that I do my best to see that I am well informed so that I can answer questions in this chamber in a way in which questions were never answered before.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: In previous times, there were on this side of the house four cabinet ministers who had portfolios to answer questions, and I think they were kept pretty busy. Now we have one, and I do the best I can. I am not ashamed of my performance in that respect and I must say that I do not appreciate that kind of comment.

Senator Argue: I do not like to make comments that the Leader of the Government does not appreciate. If I have offended him, I regret that.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: I believe it to be perfectly correct that the Leader of the Government in the Senate does, from time to time, almost stick his neck out by saying that he hopes, by a certain date, he may be able to bring to the Senate an announcement that is to be made by the appropriate minister.

However, I think the Leader of the Government in the Senate warrants being consulted by his colleagues in cabinet on every occasion, especially with regard to western agricultural questions. I do not want him to misinterpret my comment when I say that I hope he is considered to be an integral part of the consultations that go on within the cabinet, because I think his input is important.

Senator Roblin: My response to that is that I do enjoy a close relationship with my colleagues and I do receive information on matters of current concern. However, I think it will be appreciated that I cannot always anticipate the questions that will be asked here. There are bound to be occasions when the question concerns a matter that is not what one would call of strategic importance or, if it is, that it is one which I have not anticipated.

I think my colleagues do a good job in keeping me abreast of what goes on.

WHEAT EXPORTS TO REPUBLIC OF CHINA

Hon. Jack Austin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a supplementary question regarding western wheat.

Given that it is the policy of China to become self-sufficient in wheat and that they are rapidly approaching their objective since they increased their production of wheat from 41 million tons in 1979 to 87 million tons in 1984, which meets the larger part of their domestic requirement; and given that it is also their objective to become a major international wheat exporter in the next few years, and that the international wheat market has become extremely competitive—the U.S. having seen their export earnings from wheat drop to $5.8 billion from $8.3 billion in the last two years—can the Leader of the Government advise us as to what the prospects are for Canadian wheat farmers in the China market; how long are our fixed agreements with them; and whether the Chinese are indicating they will continue to buy wheat from us long term?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I may say that the farmer in western Canada is now facing the treasuries not just of the United States but of the world. That may sound like an exaggeration, and perhaps it is, but in that connection one has to accept the fact that India, which for years was an importer of wheat, is now an exporter. One has to accept the fact that under the common agricultural policy of the European Community, millions of bushels of highly-subsidized wheat are being, in my opinion, dumped on the world market at far below cost on the continent of Europe. In the United States, as Senator Argue and others have mentioned, an enormous subsidy of some $50 billion or $60 billion is being talked of, at any rate, in support of the American farmers; so, there is a problem.

To the best of my knowledge, China has not yet reached the stage where she is in the export market, in spite of the figures given by my friend. My information is that, recently, the Chinese have not been able to realize the targets which they have set for themselves with respect to wheat. My information—which I believe is correct, but which I will check—is that the Canadian Wheat Board has concluded negotiations with China which will result in substantial sales to that country.

Having said that, the question of marketing Canadian wheat is going to be a man-size job. I think that those who are in charge of it in the Canadian Wheat Board—and Senator Argue will appreciate this—will need all the support they can get from us.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONER

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to bootleg a question in here. The effectiveness of the Canadian Wheat Board in the international markets of the world has been proven time and time again. I think that the commissioners, who share equal authority under the act—and that was complained of by the Honourable Erik Nielsen's "instant experts" who were recently examining the operation of the Wheat Board—work very well. My question is: Can the minister tell us when the vacancy created by the resignation of Commissioner Jim Liebfried will be filled? I express the hope that the minister is casting widely to endeavour to get a man of the tremendous calibre of Jim Liebfried—if, indeed, such a person can be found—to fill the current vacancy on the board. I think it is fair to say that the board needs all of its commissioners. They have a very heavy workload and travel extensively throughout the world. I think that our markets, although they are difficult, are in very good hands in terms of the Wheat Board's area of responsibility.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The minister is canvassing widely in western Canada to find the best possible nominee.

AGRICULTURE

POTATO INDUSTRY—STABILIZATION POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, Senator Olson has said that wheat and oil are the most important commodities for western Canada. Agriculture, fisheries and transportation are very important to Atlantic Canada. Does the Leader of the Government in the Senate have that good word for me today from the Minister of Agriculture indicating some assistance, by means of a stabilization policy, to the potato industry of this country?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I see that we are on another campaign here. We have dealt with sugar-beets and now we are going to deal with potatoes. I have told my honourable friend—and I would like him to remember this because it is the answer he is going to get on subsequent occasions if he raises the matter again—that I am pursuing the matter diligently with the Minister of Agriculture. I think that some progress may be anticipated. I cannot tell him how much and I cannot tell him when, but I can tell him that it is a very live issue.

Senator Frith: A very hot potato, is it?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, according to the local newspapers of Prince Edward Island, this matter is on the agenda of the cabinet. That was information provided by some of the private secretaries to some of the ministers. Although the minister in the Senate cannot tell us what is on the agenda of cabinet, apparently some of the secretaries to some of the ministers can. I hope that when the Leader of the Government sits in that cabinet meeting, he will put forward a very strong voice for Atlantic Canada so that these potato growers can get some sort of equalization payments. When we consider that we can buy 50 pounds of potatoes for the price of a loaf of bread, it is clear that people involved in the agricultural industry in Atlantic Canada need some assistance, as do people in the west.

TRANSPORT

TASK FORCE REPORT—ELIMINATION OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND FERRY SERVICE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, upon reading the task force report of the Deputy Prime Minister, I find that he has suggested that the ferry service from Prince Edward Island be removed because they would no longer pay the subsidy from Wood Islands to Caribou. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure us that that recommendation will never be implemented? Can he confirm that it could only be someone who never understood Prince Edward Island, never understood Canada and never understood transportation who would ever put that suggestion into the task force report? Can he confirm that it will never be carried out by any government of Canada as long as he is sitting in it?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I must point out to my honourable friend that the recommendations are not even that—they are merely options. That is all they are; they are options. The members of the task force do not recommend. They indicate a situation which they think calls for comment and they make a comment. But that is their comment. This is done without regard for the political aspects of the matter and is done, perhaps, without knowledge of the full impact of what they are suggesting. That is quite possible.

I have been consulting with the Leader of the Opposition about this matter. It is our intention to have these reports referred to committee, possibly to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, possibly to a number of committees if we think that the subject matter can be divided up, so as to expedite the work. I expect my honourable friend to attend that committee to give the solid reasons that he has to support that ferry system, so that the opinion of the Senate can be well recorded.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I will certainly be present at any committee meeting that considers the suggestion that we do away with the ferry system whereby Canadians can enjoy the culture of Prince Edward Island. I would not want to take away from Canadians the opportunity to visit that beautiful province, the cradle of Confederation, that million-acre farm, "cradled on the waves" or "Abegweit", as the Indians call it. I cannot understand how any group of Canadians could ever sit on any committee and put forward a proposal to isolate a province of this country and take away our ferries.

[Senator Bonnell.]

CN RAIL—PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND EQUIPMENT DEPARTMENT STAFF REDUCTIONS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a further question dealing with transportation. I received a letter today from the Acting Minister of Transport and Public Works in Prince Edward Island suggesting that Canadian National Railways are curtailing the equipment department in Prince Edward Island and cutting back the staff by over 50 per cent. There will be only five employees left in the province of Prince Edward Island to maintain all of the equipment.

Apparently the minister responsible for transportation has himself been in contact with CNR and has got nowhere. The provincial department has been in contact with the federal government and has got nowhere. I have now been asked, as a prominent member of the Canadian Senate, to bring the matter before the Leader of the Government to see if he will raise the matter in cabinet, on behalf of the employees of that little province, to see that Canadian National Railways do not cut the staff of the CNR equipment department by over 50 per cent in the next month.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, my honourable friend is such an eloquent spokesman that he has persuaded me that if he sends that letter across to me, I will ask my colleague to review it for him.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—OIL IMPORT TAX—AGENDA ITEM

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, in order that the Leader of the Government will not miss anything, I should like to ask him if he has ascertained whether or not the matter of an oil import tax into the United States, and therefore into the rest of North America, is on the agenda of the summit conference.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries about that.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES ACT, 1973

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Tremblay, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the third reading of the Bill C-70, intituled: "An Act to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973".—(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen: Honourable senators, in rising to make some comments on Bill C-70, I am reminded that in its Speech from the Throne on November 5, 1984, the newly elected government stated that it had, "as a high priority, measures to support and strengthen the Canadian family, which is the cornerstone of our society." Ten days later the new Minister of National Health and Welfare declared:

... it is my role ... to put forward signals and initiatives which will strengthen the role of the family and give it more prominence in society than I feel it has been given before.

No doubt Canadians awaited the signals and the initiatives the government contemplated to strengthen the Canadian family. After all, the vast majority of Canadians placed very high value on the system of social services already in place in this country.

The new Minister of National Health and Welfare himself, while vowing to strengthen the Canadian family, noted with approval the social system his government had inherited from the previous government. He stated, "It is by now a truism that we in Canada have a social system of which Canadians are proud and with which most Canadians are secure." Lest there be any doubt about his true intentions, the minister went as far as to say that he was determined to "guard stability and fairness in our social policy," that it was a "genuine" determination and that it was "non-negotiable". Any changes that were to be made in the social system were to be made with "fairness, sensitivity and equity." It certainly appeared from these first statements emanating from the government that it was taking its role as the guardian of its sacred trust seriously. Having laid before the Canadian people these general comments, the government then went on to give us some details as to its agenda.

On November 17, 1984, in an interview with the Toronto Star, the Prime Minister answered the following question:

... if ... a decision [were made] to move away from universality, would the commitment be that all the money thus saved would be applied directly to giving more money to the neediest?

The answer was:

There would be, there could be no other reason.

The question was repeated in another form:

It wouldn't be applied simply to the deficit?

At that point, one could, of course, imagine the change in the Prime Minister's countenance as he speculated upon the rudeness of the press in suggesting that savings might be applied to the deficit. So he replied:

No, absolutely not. Absolutely not. I look at people, we have winter coming, people under the poverty line in great metropolitan areas like this and others in the country.

And though he did not specifically state that something would be done to assist those people under the poverty line, one could, in retrospect, be forgiven for assuming that his statement implied a commitment to do so or, at the very least, a commitment not to add to their plight.

The Prime Minister went on to say:

... our sole concern is not to take money from a program and pay down the debt. It is to make a better utilization of limited resources in favour of those who need it the most.

Honourable senators, even though those statements were stirring, and apparently solidly based in the intentions of the government, there were still those who dared question the statements made by the Prime Minister and his ministers, as the record of the House of Commons will show. Even though we all felt that a man's word was to be believed and accepted, especially that of the Prime Minister of the country, nevertheless there were those who wanted further reassurances.

In January of 1985 the government published a consultation paper entitled "Child and Elderly Benefits" under the signature of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In that consultation paper, following on the heels of the pronouncements which I have already read, I found these words, and I quote:

From the outset, the government wants to state again, as it has done a number of times in recent weeks, that in reviewing child and elderly benefits, the government's twin tests of social responsibility and fiscal flexibility will be guided by the following principles:

These words were not the words of an anonymous, nameless, faceless bureaucrat but the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare himself; if not the written words, certainly the spoken words. The principles which he vowed to follow included, first of all, universality, and second, renunciation of a means test. The third principle he enunciated as follows, and I quote from page 6 of the consultation paper:

Any savings which may result from program changes will not be applied to a reduction of the deficit.

In addition to that commitment in the consultation paper, the minister became even more explicit and said:

If any savings are to be found, they will stay within the social benefits envelope.

That utterance was made before the House of Commons Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs on March 1, 1985. At that time he said he was not merely expressing his personal opinion on the matter. He said, and I quote:

The Minister of Health speaks from government endorsement.

Therefore the grand vision was complete; the government had pledged to strengthen the family. It recognized that the present social system was, on the whole, looked upon favourably by the Canadian people. It promised that its determination to guard stability and fairness in our social system was genuine and non-negotiable. It stated that any changes made in the social system would be guided by the principles of fairness, equity and sensitivity. The Prime Minister stated that any savings resulting from changes in social programs would not be redirected to reducing the deficit but would be redirected to the neediest people in the population. The Minister of National Health and Welfare affixed his signature to the principle enunciated by the Prime Minister; any saving would instead be earmarked for the neediest. "We have winter coming," noted the Prime Minister, and, "There are people under the poverty line," he declared.

Clearly, these were assurances and statements that were listened to carefully by the many millions in this country who depend for at least part of their income upon the maintenance of our social system of payments.

Let us spend a moment or two on some of the changes that have been made since these declarations of principle. First, may I mention the changes to the child tax exemption. Without going into the yearly changes, we know that by 1989 the value of the child tax exemption will decrease to the value of the family allowance, approximately $390. In three years the child tax exemption will decrease by approximately $320 per child under the age of 18. For a family of three children, such a reduction in the tax exemption amounts to almost $1,000. These changes to the child tax exemption will affect every family in Canada that has a taxable income. Families that are not now paying any federal income tax will find themselves paying tax in the future if they are currently just under the taxable income border line.

[Senator MacEachen.]

The reduction in the child tax exemption has, of course, absolutely no effect on childless wage earners, but it does affect all but the most destitute of families who have children. A very unusual way of "strengthening the Canadian family" and "giving greater prominence to the family," to use the words of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Of course, I must note that the child tax exemption is also being decreased for children aged 18 and over. If the dependent child is not mentally or physically infirm, the current exemption will decrease according to an annual reduction formula.

It may be that one could contemplate the validity of that move in other circumstances, but bear in mind that today we have high youth unemployment. Many young people cannot find employment and, thus, remain with their parents longer than they might wish. That is a universal phenomenon in Canada. Young people cannot leave their homes the way they used to. The government has decided that those families who find themselves in this unfortunate situation should be negatively affected by the child tax exemption changes.

One can speculate that in certain circumstances—and it has been speculated upon or commented upon by social policy analysts—the child tax exemption is regressive in that it benefits higher income families more than lower income families, and one must take that into account. But the readjustment of benefits from a more well-off group to a less well-off group is one matter; the total abolition of the benefits to all groups is quite another matter. That is a point that has to be considered in the context of strengthening the Canadian family.

I must also draw attention to the impact on Canadian families of the increases in the federal sales tax from 9 per cent to 12 per cent. Is anybody of the view that this does not bear heavily upon Canadian families not only by increasing the tax, but by bringing in new items that were not previously taxable, such as cough syrup, aspirin and vitamins? The federal sales tax does not differentiate between rich and poor; it cares not whether the sick child lives in affluence or squalor. The child becomes ill and the government collects the tax. It is self-evident that the more members in a family, the greater will be that family's sales tax burden. So, that is another matter that has to be put into the overall assessment.

Of course, there is the de-indexation of the family allowance. We know that every single family with children will be hurt by this measure. Conversely, a childless family will not be affected. This year, every family will receive $11 less for every child it has. Next year, the loss is estimated at $23 per child, and for 1990, the loss will be approximately $62 per child. One must ask: How is this measure affecting the Canadian family, how is it strengthening the Canadian family? The simple fact is that the bill, unfortunately destined for Royal Assent, takes away the first 3 per cent of the inflation protection while the increase in the Consumer Price Index is running at approximately 4 per cent. In other words, Bill C-70 is taking away three quarters of the increase in family allowance benefits that Canadians would normally have expected to receive this year—and that is when inflation is at 4 per cent. We can only assume that if inflation had been at 10 per cent the government would have taken an even greater amount of protection away from the family. But it is a fact that under this bill it is taking away three quarters of the expected benefits.

Of course, in discussing the child tax exemption, the increase in the federal sales tax and the de-indexation of the family allowance, one must deal with the fourth measure, namely, the adjustment to the child tax credit. For the 1986 taxation year, the tax credit will rise by $70 to $454, and for the years 1987 and 1988, it will increase by $35, and after 1988, it will be indexed to increases in the Consumer Price Index in excess of 3 percentage points. In sum, in the next three years the child tax credit will increase $140. In four years time, in 1989, the total child tax credit will be $529.

Now, are we to applaud this measure? Are we to say that this has compensated the Canadian family for all the other steps that have been taken by the government? Is it great enough? Is it significant enough? Is it penetrating enough to counterbalance the previously described punitive measures?

Well, let's take a look at it. In the tables presented to the chamber by the government, it is shown that if the government did nothing to the child tax credit but simply increased it by the amount of the consumer price index, as had been done in the previous few years, it would rise to an estimated $449 in 1989. The difference between what it would have been under full indexation and what it will be under the government's new scheme is $80—$80 per child in 1989. Now, is that overwhelming generosity? Is that in fulfilment of the grand plan enunciated by the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare in support of the Canadian family? The increase would be $80. But by that time family allowances will have decreased by $48 per child. The net difference then becomes $32, a gain of $32 by 1989. These figures, of course, do not take into account the loss suffered through the reduction in the child tax exemption or the increased expenses caused by the federal sales tax increases.

We also know that the threshold limit for the child tax credit is being reduced from $26,330 to $23,500, where it was in 1981—five years ago. Since it is not fully indexed, it will continue to decrease in relative terms every year. Fewer families will in future qualify for the child tax credit. Under the government's plan, it will become a program—I will not say for the destitute, but for the very poor, indeed.

I want to say how different this social policy is from a truly Liberal social policy.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen: How different! It has been shown, even in the tables produced by Senator Tremblay, that in 1982 the Liberal government of that day increased family allowances, increased the child tax exemption, increased the child tax credit and increased the income limit for the child tax credit. All four were enhanced in that particular year by the former government. That is the difference between a social policy that is Liberal and a social policy that is parsimonious, and grudging, and ungenerous, and Conservative.

Honourable senators, that is my comment, but let me turn to the analysis made by the National Council of Welfare. It is a body with status, supported and sponsored by the Government of Canada. It has referred to the effect of this bill together with the other changes in child benefits. It has stated as follows, and I quote from page 32 of their document:

... only the poorest families with incomes below the tax paying threshold will benefit from these changes, and at that in rather modest amounts for a few years. After the various changes are phased in—and there are a group of changes, as I have mentioned.

After the various changes are phased in—raising the child tax credit, lowering the turnover point for the child tax credit... reducing the children's exemption to the annual family allowance, and partially indexing all child benefits—even the poorest parents will receive less than they would from the existing child benefits system.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame.

Senator MacEachen: So says the National Council of Welfare:

After the various changes are phased in... even the poorest parents will receive less than they would from the existing child benefits system. In the meantime, many lower-income and all middle-income families will suffer losses in child benefits starting in 1986.

The poorest, the lower-income and the middle-income.

Then, having analyzed the impact probably more objectively—or at least they ought to be regarded as more objective and more knowledgeable than any of us—they go on to say that the 1985 budget proposals will remove $555 million from the child benefits system by 1990. I repeat, $555 million will be removed from the child benefits system, despite the assurances given by the Prime Minister, despite the assurances given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare and, unhappily, to the detriment of Canadian families.

Some Hon. Senators: Terrible.

Senator MacEachen: That means that about half a billion dollars will be taken away from families with children.

Mr. Epp stated that the government would “strengthen the role of the family.” How is it being strengthened? Is “strengthening” interpreted to mean: “Give them greater adversity”? He also stated that the Canadian family would be given more prominence. Well, what is this prominence? It is as a source of funds in reducing the deficit. I wonder how many Canadian families feel gratified at this new prominence bestowed by the Government of Canada.

You know, the promises I have quoted were made in November 1984 by Mr. Mulroney and as late as March 1985 by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the May budget of 1985—and this bill is an emanation of that budget—the government swept away all the assurances and commitments that it had given to the Canadian people and to Parliament and to the standing committees. Indeed, money is being taken from the child benefits system—half a billion dollars at least—and it is not being redirected to the children or the parents of children.

Mr. Epp faced up to this question when he appeared before the Senate committee. Gone were the fine words; gone were the commitments about retaining the integrity of the social envelope. He said: "I am facing, quite frankly, a deficit of $22 billion." So he let the intent of the government out in that statement. He went on to say, "If we cannot reduce the cost of that deficit, that money is gone," and so on—further words defending the action of the government in redirecting this money to reducing the deficit, something which the Prime Minister said was never to be in the mind of the government—"Never! Absolutely not!" "Never!" once; "Absolutely not!" twice. When Senator Graham asked, "Is all the money to be saved through this legislation going to fight the deficit?" Mr. Epp answered, "No, it is not all going to fight the deficit." In other words, he could not really bring himself to make the admission, "Yes, it is all going to fight the deficit." However, he did acknowledge that the families with children in this country have now been called upon to soldier on with the Minister of Finance to reduce the deficit despite the commitments of the Prime Minister.

I do not think any of us should be in any doubt that that money saved as a result of changes to the child benefits system is going into the government's coffers to fight the deficit. I will return later to some alternatives that I think they might have used rather than interfering with the child benefits system.

Honourable senators, I have not found from members of any of the other committees the same kind of reaction I found from members of this committee with respect to the testimony they heard from Canadian citizens who appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was examining that bill. I have heard individual senators say that the testimony was heartrending and that an emotional atmosphere was introduced into the committee because witnesses described from first-hand knowledge the impact these changes would have on their lives. It may be difficult for those of us who are in relatively well-paying positions to understand the phenomenon that $50 or $100 is to some people a very big sum. These people came and said that it was.

When the Minister of Finance announced the advance payment of the child tax credit, he said that it would be paid to one million Canadian families with incomes of less than $15,000. I am absolutely shocked that there are one million families with incomes of less than $15,000. That is a pretty tough statistic. They are expected to live and raise their families on incomes of less than $15,000. Even in that context, the government is withdrawing support from them. Honourable senators, it was not Liberal senators who said that; it was said by the witnesses who appeared before the committee. They said that these measures introduced by the government are hurting the family badly.

This government, despite its commitments, is, in my view, showing unexpected callousness as it withdraws support or gives it in so niggardly a fashion to the disadvantaged segment of our society.

A government that could provide a $500,000 capital gains exemption should not come to Parliament and ask us to readjust the family benefits system in this manner. The $500,000 capital gains exemption for individuals—for very rich individuals—will cost the treasury $600 million in 1986-87 and an estimated $1.2 billion in 1990-91. The government found largesse for the very rich, but not much largesse for the poorer families of Canada.

Honourable senators, I am sure we all remember the $1 billion that was given to the uninsured depositors of the Canadian Commercial Bank. If all of these things had not happened, honourable senators, it might be easier for us to accept this kind of proposal.

I want to assure honourable senators that we Liberals, who participated in the building-up of a social security system which found so much favour in the mind of Mr. Epp, are profoundly unhappy that this bill is brought before the Parliament of Canada. There is no largesse for Canadian children; no largesse for even the poorest children of Canada; but there is largesse for the rich taxpayer and the unsecured depositors of the Canadian Commercial Bank.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator MacEachen: I think the government has its priorities badly mixed up.

I want to conclude, honourable senators, by quoting the testimony of Mr. Bradley of the Shepherds of Good Hope in Ottawa, as given before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology on February 27, 1986. I am aware that Senator Graham also read these words, but they are so touching that I think they warrant repeating. Mr. Bradley said:

We are having a lot of difficulty now with youngsters. They are coming out of homes at 16 years of age where the family has said, "Listen . . . we cannot feed you any more. You have to go out and fend for yourself." They come to us often in tears because they do not know how to make their way in life.

The symbolism of Bill C-70 is very clear: It is that the child benefit system, the family support system, built so carefully in Canada is now being deliberately and carefully eroded by the action of the government in the guise of improvements. Honourable senators, benign neglect would have been preferable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I hope that we have now reached the terminal phase of consideration of Bill C-70, which started on January 22 of this year, not counting the preliminary study in committee during December 1985.

Not counting my own contribution as mover of the motion for second reading, nine senators took part in the ensuing debate. The debate on second reading was concluded on February 13 upon referral of the bill to the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

From February 24 to March 11, the committee heard representatives from all agencies and associations that had asked to be heard and were able to appear before the committee. On March 11, the minister himself, the Honourable Jake Epp, came to meet the committee, following a last minute request by certain committee members. The minister had previously appeared before the committee last December, at the preliminary study stage. That same day, I had the honour of presenting to this chamber the committee's report, the text of which appears in the official record of the debates of the Senate of March 11. We are therefore all familiar with the contents of the report.

Basically, the committee, after recalling that it examined the said bill, reported the same, without amendment. However, there is the following comment: The majority of the members of your committee regrets the partial de-indexing of payments under the Family Allowances Act as provided for in Bill C-70 and recommends that full indexation of these payments be re-instated by January 1987.

That was in the report tabled last week. On the motion I then submitted, the bill was placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading. Last week, Senator Graham and Senator Marsden expressed their views on the bill. The Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, has just done so.

This was then a summary of the progress we have made in the nearly two months we have been considering Bill C-70.

I could scarcely presume to draw any kind of conclusion from everything that has been said on the subject during these two months, either in this chamber or in committee, nor will I try to make a distinction among the wide variety of opinions expressed, between those I found most worthwhile and those which in my opinion were not as useful. In any case, I readily agree that the views expressed, although they did not always run parallel to mine—on the contrary—have given me a great deal to think about in many respects. I therefore extend my sincere thanks to all involved, and especially to those who took the trouble to testify before the committee. It was not always easy for them to fit in to the schedule we had to follow for the proceedings to progress at a reasonable speed.

I express special thanks to the witnesses who appeared to state the case of families for whom welfare benefits are practically the only source of income. When I say this I have in mind, among others, the group of Concordia women and the group of mothers from Montreal's St. Columba Centre who had the courage to tell us about their personal plight and the situation of others in a similar predicament. Obviously the situation of those families can be improved under the new child benefit system, particularly as a result of the more generous tax credit.

In the case of those families—and I think Senator MacEachen will agree with me—his comments concerning the child exemption do not apply. These families happen to be below the taxable income level above which everyone becomes a taxpayer. In this case, I am referring to family allowances and the tax credit, especially the latter.

On the dates when those groups appeared before the committee the Minister of Finance had yet to make a decision. As early as November 1986, $300 will be paid to families whose net income does not exceed $15,000.

According to the information I was given, this amount corresponds to a gross income of about $16,000. Therefore a $300 tax credit prepayment will be made in November 1986 for this year. It used to be made on different dates the following year once all tax returns had been filed. In some cases it will be paid in May at the earliest, perhaps even in June. Some people used to discount their future tax credit by going to H & R Block, for instance, and asking for cash in exchange for a 15 per cent interest fee on the first $300, but at least a corrective measure has been taken since legislation to that effect was passed last fall. Before that people were asked to pay outrageous amounts.

I must point out that on that occasion last fall the minister, Mr. Côté, had already indicated he was considering the possibility of making prepayments, so it was not a sure thing at the time. In his budget speech the Minister of Finance announced that a $300 prepayment would be made as early as November this year, which is quite a change.

The fact that the tax credit was paid only once a year, and several months late at that, was often mentioned by the groups representing the families I talked about as being a major problem. Honourable senators who attended the committee hearings are aware of this. Some of the family representatives even suggested that the tax credit be paid on a monthly basis. What will be the reaction of those families when they learn that as early as next November they will receive a substantial amount, and that from here on in the tax credit will be paid at least twice a year?

It seems to me that the reaction of those families can only be positive because they were the object of this government policy. Admittedly, even that new step in the right direction is not going to signal the end of difficulties for those families. Their many problems cannot possibly be solved by a child benefit system, no matter how good it may be.

I would say that many of the comments that were made, including several by the Leader of the Opposition, raised a very valid point which is the general circumstances of these families. The most perfect child benefit system will never be able to solve all the problems of our families. There are those who look to the economy for a solution and those who look to the tax system. All of this was discussed in committee, but a system of child benefits alone will never be able to solve all these problems. I would like to emphasize the reception given all witnesses who appeared before the committee, and especially witnesses like those I just mentioned, and I am talking about committee members on either side of this chamber. I think the attitude of the committee was always very open and very understanding when such problems were put before its members. I myself pointed out in my comments on January 22 that Bill C-70, and Bill C-84, which has now been adopted, and the prepayment of part of the Child Tax Credit are only one step.

We have never said otherwise. It is one step in the right direction. It will not necessarily bring the system to that ideal level where it would be an effective response to the real needs of the target population. Other steps remain to be made. The Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology took this perspective when it prepared the Interim Report I had the honour of tabling in this house on December 18 last year, following referral to the committee last spring of the consultation paper on child and elderly benefits, after the committee's preliminary study of Bill C-70.

It seems to me that Senator Graham had much the same thing in mind last week when he proposed the following, in concluding his speech.

Honourable senators, I propose that the Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology seriously consider putting in place a process which would produce concrete proposals for meeting the needs of families today, to the year 2000 and beyond. However, I believe that we should set target dates in this respect.

He went on to explain that the committee should take on the role of a major task force with a solid mandate to develop a concrete plan of action.

• (1510)

That is precisely what I had in mind when I first spoke on January 22. In her remarks of last Thursday, March 13, Senator Marsden insisted on what she considers to be fundamental and irreconcilable differences between the approach taken by the government—which it intends to keep—and what she favours in terms of family and child benefits, particularly concerning the respective or redistributing value of either family allowances or even the tax credit.

Well, I presume that when she stated those principles she did not mean she would refuse to take part in the dialogue when the committee gets around to preparing its second report on this subject.

In any case, I for one do not reject the possibility that such a dialogue will finally enable us to reconcile our viewpoints. I hope she will tackle the issue in the same spirit when we continue our study.

In passing, Senator Marsden, I would like if I may to call your attention to the French version of your speech in the official report. I saw the mistake myself because I read the French version first as I can understand it more easily and read it more quickly. If you have not already made the correction, you will note that, on the bottom of the first column on page 2158, what you said has clearly been distorted in the French version. I was surprised when I read the French text and I therefore looked at the English version. That is when I understood that the French version was wrong. I therefore wanted to call your attention to this matter in passing. I would not like it if my own comments were wrongly translated.

[Senator Tremblay.]

We have just heard the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, the Honourable Senator MacEachen. Many comments could be made about each of the points he has raised. I shall only mention two or three of them.

At one time, he asked whether, if the consumer price index were to increase by 10 per cent, the 3 per cent figure would not have been higher. By saying that 3 per cent is three quarters of four, the senator suggested, even though he did not say so directly, that, if the inflation rate was 10 per cent, what would be subtracted would be three quarters of 10. This is the major point. Heaven knows that, in years when the inflation rate was high in the past, the government did exactly what the honourable senator said. In 1976, the increase in family allowances was simply set at the level of the previous year. This freeze meant that the amount was 10 per cent lower than it should have been, if my memory serves me right, because the inflation rate was about at that level. Later, in 1983-84, the increase was set at 5 or 6 per cent, which was 7 per cent lower than it should have been for a specific year, which one I do not recall exactly.

However, that is not the system proposed by this government. This is exactly what I said in my presentation. According to our formula, over 3 per cent, whatever the inflation rate, families will be protected. I did not really appreciate this implication.

As a second and more general comment, I noted a kind of alternation, not only in the comments of Senator MacEachen, but in others also. I am talking about the alternation between a description of the situation for families in general and that of low-income families. When the intention is to emphasize the role of the family, the opposition says how much families in general will lose because of the government proposal. It is quite obvious. The tax credit is being significantly increased and it will affect only low-income or very low-income families. Therefore, while the family allowances received by high-income families have been reduced, these families will not make up the difference since they will not benefit from the tax credit. However, low-income families will make up the difference. This is when families in general are mentioned. Then, the opposition goes on to low-income families and says that a gross income of $15,000, $16,000 or $23,500 is insufficient. We could discuss this issue at length. However, one thing is certain, and that is that, with the prepayment, and I recognize in this regard that the figures quoted by Senator MacEachen correspond to my own, because of the increase in the tax credit, there is a very clear gain for needy families like those who appeared before our committee and who rely only or virtually only on welfare payments to survive.

I think that this is the basic issue. We have said so all along, and the government also. However, before concluding, I think that I should come back to the matter of the savings which would be put to other uses than those indicated by the government and the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Once more, there is a difference in terms. Certain people have said that the government promised that these savings would not be used for other things than social programs. They also argue that these savings will not be used for child and family benefits. But let us not forget that the legislation of last June was targeted to the social envelope, the old age pension for widows aged 60 to 64, which represents sizeable amounts. The social envelope is that much richer. Wherever they came from, the funds were not channelled towards anything else but the social envelope. In my judgment—at least that is my conviction, it is debatable and we will have an opportunity to consider this during committee proceedings—we should look at the figures: a gain of $289 for one million families in 1986, well that is indeed a huge prepayment. The net cost to the government is not the amount in question, of course.

Recently I read in Mr. Malépart's release that prepayments do not cost the government anything. That is not true. The former Minister of Finance knows that better than anybody else. Making a payment six months in advance will cost at least the interest on the amount paid out for those six months. The government borrows for its operations, so it has to cost something, it is not a free handout.

In any case, let us look again at later years, where the massive gain of 1986 gradually fades away. Fifty-five dollars for the same million families is something. It is net gain, but remember, these are families for whom the issue of child tax exemptions is irrelevant. How can anyone claim there is no transfer from families with higher incomes to low-income families? I think it is pretty obvious. In fact, this is the approach the government has always supported. I myself have referred to this principle, as have other intervenors on our side. So if we can't agree on this principle, I suppose this means the entire approach is being challenged. But it is our approach and it is entirely in line with the statements that were made, and I do not see the contradiction that Senator MacEachen was trying to point out.

So that is where we are now. I am sorry that Senator MacEachen did not end his speech like Senator Graham, acknowledging that there are bigger problems and that we must broaden our perspective. The committee should get to work as soon as possible to consider these problems, study them thoroughly and upgrade the system. That is what I said myself the other day.

I hope that now we will get to work, at the chamber's earliest convenience. In my opinion, the right time is now, and we should go on from where we left off.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Bill read third time and passed on division.

IMMIGRATION ACT, 1976

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Barootes, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the third reading of the Bill C-55 intitled: "An Act to amend the Immigration Act, 1976".—(Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C.).

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to speak on third reading of Bill C-55. Although it is a short and simple piece of legislation, its purpose, content and implications are very important and therefore should interest us all, not only in this chamber but also those Canadians who are concerned about immigration and refugee matters. I do not think that I am exaggerating when I say that Canada is largely a country of immigrants and their immediate descendants. The largest inflow of immigrants to Canada was in 1913 when we received 400,870 in this land. Since 1852 Canada has welcomed to its shores more than 12 million immigrants, displaced persons and refugees to populate and develop its vast territory, the second largest in the world after the U.S.S.R.

The early immigrants did not have the same education or the amenities or the assistance of governmental agencies, churches, social welfare organizations and yet, by their determination and sacrifice, they were able to settle in barren land, to adjust and to contribute to the development and enrichment of all sectors of Canadian life. Many poor immigrants and their children became prominent educators, scientists, entrepreneurs, members of various professions, war heroes and even political leaders and statesmen.

Senator Bosa: Like you.

Senator Haidasz: And like Senator Bosa, who immigrated from Italy in the 1950s.

Senator Bosa: I said, Senator Haidasz.

Senator Haidasz: I am the son of a Polish immigrant who came here in 1910.

I believe that in debating this bill it is proper and worthwhile to remind ourselves of these facts. Canada speaks to the world through its Immigration Act. Section 3 of this act reads:

It is hereby declared that Canadian immigration policy and the rules and regulations made under this Act shall be designed and administered in such manner as to promote the domestic and international interests of Canada recognizing the need—

And here we go to paragraph (b) which says:

to enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada, taking into account the federal and bilingual character of Canada;

Then in paragraph (g) it says:

to fulfil Canada's international and legal obligations with respect to refugees and to uphold its humanitarian tradition with respect to the displaced and the persecuted;

● (1530)

However, the minister, in amending Bill C-55, to amend the Immigration Act, 1976, unfortunately failed to bring it into line with section 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms which requires the acknowledgement of the preservation and enhancement of the multicultural heritage of Canadians. This certainly does not speak well of this government's purported commitment to multiculturalism.

As one who was given ministerial responsibility in 1972 to implement the federal government's policy on multiculturalism, it has been my long-standing concern, shared also by many others, as was illustrated in a speech by Senator Bosa in this place a few weeks ago, that the true multicultural nature of the Canadian mosaic should be reflected in its laws and institutions. I therefore appeal to the Minister of Employment and Immigration to include in the new act a statement of the multicultural character of Canada. This could be in the form of a preamble to the new bill, or in the section dealing specifically with the broad objectives of Canada's immigration policy. This has been promised many times, but has never been done.

However, Bill C-55, the bill that we are dealing with at the present time, appears to make only very minor changes to the Immigration Appeal Board, and the Liberal and New Democratic members in the other place have opposed it. To understand why, one must be aware of the background to this bill. I speak of Canada's slow progress towards a new refugee status determination policy. In the past few years, it has become increasingly clear that the current refugee determination process is a cumbersome one. It is time consuming, and is a process that does not really meet Canada's high standards of fundamental justice. It is, unfortunately, an adversarial system.

I want to make it clear that in Bill C-55 we are discussing only people who make a claim for refugee status in Canada and people who are appealing sponsorship claims. Under our international commitments, we must give these people a chance to have their claim decided, because, accepting a UN Convention, we are under an obligation not to send true refugees back to countries where they fear they will be persecuted because of their race, religion, nationality, membership in a particular social group or because they are of a particular political opinion. For years, refugees, church groups, interested organizations, immigration lawyers and concerned Canadians have been saying that Canada's methods of determining refugee status are really unfair. In April of 1985 the highest court in the land, the Supreme Court of Canada, agreed with them and declared part of the Immigration Act unconstitutional. The part of the process singled out in this case was the power given to the Immigration Appeal Board to make a decision in refugee determination matters without any requirement that the board actually see and hear the refugee claimant. At no stage did a claimant appear in person before the actual decision maker. The Supreme Court of Canada declared that an oral hearing was essential, in light of the importance of the decision to refugee claimants which is, in many cases, actually a question of life or death. The court declared that the board must hold oral hearings in every refugee case that comes before it. Clause 5 of Bill C-55 will now require this procedure.

As a result of the fact that the system is so cumbersome, a very large refugee claimant backlog has accumulated, which we are now told totals close to 19,000 cases. Bottlenecks in the system existed even before the Supreme Court decision requiring an oral hearing. This situation has, I think, become worse because of that decision. These people will now be referred from the Immigration Appeal Board to the Federal Court, and back and forth.

Bill C-55 will raise the number of members on the Immigration Appeal Board from 18 to 50. Perhaps not all of the 50 will be appointed immediately. However, in reading the minutes of the committees that studied Bill C-55, none of the witnesses was sure—not even the Chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board—just what the situation would be. In fact, that witness, in answering a question during one of those committee hearings, said that the members of the board currently serving are appointed for one ten-year term. Yet, I know one member on the Immigration Appeal Board who has been serving for almost 20 years. I have read many such confusing and imprecise answers to questions of members of both houses in the minutes of the respective committees that studied Bill C-55, and that is unfortunate.

We all know that over the past couple of years at least, if not three years, a number of studies have been undertaken by ministers to determine ways of changing this unfair and adversarial system dealing with refugee claims. The most recent study was Rabbi Plaut's thorough and sensitive report which contained a great number of recommendations for the overhaul of the system. This report by Rabbi Gunther Plaut called "The Refugee Determination in Canada" makes very interesting reading. It was given to the minister in April 1985, but was tabled in this chamber only on June 17, 1985. I am not aware of the reason for the delay.

The House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration studied the Plaut report intensively and made further recommendations, but the government has not as yet acted on any of these recommendations, even though we were promised new legislation on immigration for the fall of 1985.

Honourable senators, in view of all of this, I think it should be clear by now that we should have strong reservations about Bill C-55. In view of the statements of the ministers to the House of Commons committee and in view of the statements of the witnesses to the Senate committee that studied this bill, I think it is clear that Bill C-55 is a bill that is inadequate. It is only a band-aid solution, a temporary measure to deal with this very important problem of refugee determination. That does not mean, however, that there are no good features in this bill. Clause 6 gives permanent residents the right to appeal sponsorship cases, a right that, until now, has been reserved only for Canadian citizens. This change will entail more costs and more time, but it is in line with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which guarantees equity for all. The expanded workload and the backlog in refugee and sponsorship appeals clearly indicates the need for more members on the Immigration Appeal Board, so I and my colleagues support this aspect of the bill.

We also support the amendment to the bill accepted by the House of Commons legislative committee that would continue to require a three-member panel to hear these refugee and sponsorship appeals, and not just the one-member panel. I think that these are important clauses because they affect the lives of people in many ways. As I mentioned before, for some refugees it is a matter of life or death.

Despite the good features of this bill, however, our concerns about the reform of the refugee determination system still remain. We ask that the government move quickly to implement the recommendations of the Plaut report and of the House of Commons standing committee which studied it and Bill C-55.

The second issue I wish to raise during my remarks on third reading of Bill C-55 relates to the concerns that have been expressed to the government and committee members about the so-called economic aspect of immigration. On January 1 of this year, a number of important changes were made to the regulations. A new category of "investor" was introduced to make it clear that Canada favours immigrants who are wealthy; a new occupations list was devised favouring the more highly skilled; and a point system was revised upward to make it more difficult for potential immigrants to come to Canada.

It may be that wealthy immigrants create jobs, but so do other immigrants. I know many immigrants who came from Italy, poor people, who today are great entrepreneurs and who have employed hundreds of people during their lives in Canada. Some of those have risen to become directors of corporations with holdings in the millions. I think Canada owes a great debt to those immigrants who came here, found menial jobs and then started businesses of their own, employed others, and contributed substantially to the growth of the Canadian economy. They did that without having had to prove that they were "investors" with a minimum net worth, or "entrepreneurs" in the eyes of immigration officers abroad.

I urge the government to undertake a study of sponsored immigrants who have come to Canada over the past 40 years. I think the government would learn some very valuable lessons. I predict that it would learn that these people were true entrepreneurs. They invested in Canada, and in so doing both they and Canada prospered. Jobs, honourable senators, are created by the hard work of Canada's immigrants and their commitment to their new country. I am sure that a study of that kind will bear that out.

I should also like to raise a third issue during this debate, and that relates to the plight of refugees and humanitarian cases who have been granted landed immigrant status in the great hope that they would make it in their professions. Unfortunately, those highly dedicated and qualified professional people—such as medical doctors, dentists, and engineers in particular—are having a very difficult time not only finding a job, but, what is worse, qualifying in their respective professions.

When looking for a job they are told: "You can't have it. You are too highly educated, too qualified." Others hear this explanation: "You have no Canadian experience." I have heard these stories in my Ottawa and Toronto offices often, and read about them in many letters sent to me from across Canada. I sympathize with those people very deeply.

May I bring to your attention, honourable senators, the sad and tragic plight of refugee and immigrant medical doctors who, after being allowed to write the medical evaluation examinations abroad, or who have passed them here in Canada, and having been granted landed immigrant status, and even having been granted Canadian citizenship, are told that they have to wait their turn on a long waiting list for the rare rotating internship position in a qualified teaching hospital before they can write the Medical Council of Canada examination, which gives them the licence to practise medicine in this country.

Unfortunately, there are over 570 foreign medical graduates in Canada who have passed this qualifying examination, yet cannot find an approved internship in a hospital, even an unfunded one. I hear of these cases almost every week.

Yesterday I spent about an hour and a half with some of them. Some of these medical doctors are in their fifties and have been waiting for four years for an internship position. As I mentioned, some of them are Canadian citizens, and some I know in Toronto were born in Canada. They had to go abroad to obtain a medical education because there were no places in our medical schools, they were told.

Senator Hicks: Not the schools, the hospitals.

Senator Haidasz: These people are frustrated and desperate today; some are very disenchanted, disappointed and angry. Some feel that they have been misled by immigration officers; others feel betrayed. I believe that they have the right to expect equality of opportunity in the spirit of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The reasons for lack of sufficient internship positions is that provincial governments are not providing sufficient funding, and the provincial health ministers and governments are saying that they are not receiving enough federal funding.

The Federal-Provincial Advisory Committee on Medical Manpower stated in a report based on 1980 statistics that there is an oversupply of medical doctors in Canada, yet there are many provincial health departments advertising financial incentives to lure medical doctors to underserved areas of this country.

As I mentioned earlier, among the things I did yesterday in Toronto was to have an hour's talk with Dr. Bob Sheppard, the Vice-Dean of Academic Studies at the University of Toronto. I found him to be a very compassionate medical colleague, one very interested in the sad situation of foreign medical graduates in Canada. So, there are some thoughtful and compassionate people who would like to present innovative ideas to solve this sad problem.

I might add here, honourable senators, that a similar problem existed in 1956 with the influx of many Hungarian physicians and dentists who came here after the Hungarian Revolution. We also dealt successfully with the doctors and dentists who came from Czechoslovakia after that country was invaded in 1968. I take this opportunity, honourable senators, to make a public appeal to the Minister of National Health and Welfare to call, without undue delay, a special federal-provincial health ministers' meeting and invite other interested concerned ministers and their provincial counterparts to give their urgent and serious attention to this situation so that they can bring in effective measures to solve the problem of lack of funded and even unfunded rotating internship positions in qualified hospitals, and to accept the offer of these foreign medical graduates who are saying they are willing to work under contract in underserved and remote areas of Canada.

I believe this matter is so urgent and so painful that such a meeting is warranted. This matter is becoming a scandalous waste of resources, indeed, a personal tragedy and, I am afraid, a national scandal. It cries for justice. In fact, this situation, I believe, is both intolerant and intolerable. I fear that these foreign medical graduates will make formal appeals to the Canadian Human Rights Commission and to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, and I have even heard that they are preparing to launch a class action legal suit. This, certainly, will not be good for the image of the provincial and federal governments in the eyes of concerned Canadians and in the eyes of the world.

In concluding my remarks on Bill C-55, I must also state that I was not very impressed with this piecemeal legislation and with the study it has been given by both houses.

Since this bill was introduced in the House of Commons by the Minister of Employment and Immigration on June 19, 1985, this important matter, I believe, has been treated only superficially and presented confusingly. The Minister of Employment and Immigration issued a communiqué on June 19, 1985, which reads:

The question of a new structure for refugee claims determination is very complex both in legal and policy terms . . . the intent here is to do the minimum necessary to keep the claims system going until I introduce major legislation changes in the fall.

That meant the fall of 1985.

The Minister of State (Immigration) reiterated in his speech in the House of Commons on September 26 last year, and I quote:

Later this fall—

The fall of 1985:

—legislation will be introduced stemming from both a review of Rabbi Plaut's report and the views of interested Canadians. This legislation will form the basis of a new refugee determination system, a new commitment to those in need.

He went on to say that Bill C-55 "is in no way connected to this larger legislative reform which will be proposed later in the year 1985."

Well, something has gone wrong in Brian's fairy kingdom. The fall has gone, so has winter. We are now on the threshold of the spring of 1986, and still we do not have this promised larger legislative reform on immigration.

I ask honourable senators, and in particular the sponsor of the bill: Where is this legislation? Has it been lost? Has it been forgotten? Has it been shredded?

Last June we believed those ministers and accepted their announcements, but what are we to think, what are we to say or what are we to do today in dealing with Bill C-55 and its related immigration matters? Well, we are impatiently waiting for answers, for action, and for the fulfillment of ministerial promises, even at this late date. I have perused the committee reports of both houses, and the parliamentary debates since they started on September 26, 1985. Neither the Minister of Employment and Immigration nor the Minister of State for Immigration has appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology studying Bill C-55.

Furthermore, no questions were asked in either committee about the present and future estimated costs of processing a refugee and sponsorship claim. So, I tried to find out from the Immigration Appeal Board—no answer. Then I phoned the Department of Employment and Immigration—few answers. So, in frustration, I phoned the minister's office. Later, I got a phone call in my office and I was given some imprecise round figures of some of the costs. I was told that the person responsible was unavailable, but the figures that could be given—and they were only approximate costs—showed that it cost the Canadian taxpayer $16 million to process refugee claims in 1984, and this figure might rise fourfold in 1986. That means it will be $64 million when the provisions of Bill C-55 are enacted and implemented. I was also told that it costs approximately $7,000 to process a refugee claim today. Of course, this does not include the refugee's cost of a lawyer and all the other fees that have to be paid before one can have an appeal heard in the federal court or the Supreme Court of Canada. These are only some of the things that I found to be disappointing.

I liked the questions Senator Marshall raised in the committee meeting in February concerning the preferential treatment given to professional hockey players to play in Canada.

As you know, we have boys and girls playing hockey from the age of four in various leagues—minor leagues and other leagues—who are yearning to get on to a major Canadian hockey team. And what do we see? We see how easy it is for a hockey player from Sweden—where there is no violation of Human Rights and from where there are no refugees—as well as hockey players from other countries, to be allowed to come to Canada. I congratulate Senator Marshall for having raised this question. I am sorry he was not given good answers. I think he is, as I am, waiting in vain for these answers today.

Honourable senators, these are only a few more remarks that I want to bring to your attention as far as Bill C-55 is concerned. Perhaps there will be other colleagues in this chamber who would like to contribute to this very important debate, but I do not want to delay the passage of the bill because I know refugees are waiting, as is Senator Baroote and the ministers and members of the Immigration Appeal Board. Let me conclude by saying that I am looking forward to the new Immigration Act and a great debate on that legislation.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I am going to make a very brief intervention on third reading of Bill C-55, mainly to praise Senator Barootes for the very quick action he took on the suggestions that were made on second reading. It is very seldom we on this side get an opportunity to praise members of the government, because some of the legislation that is coming through in the thirty-third session has to deal with the de-indexation of family allowances and the reduction of payments to poor people. I think that Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition would be pleased to praise the government rather than to criticize its program. I myself have put several questions to the Leader of the Government—

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, my friend is speaking twice in the debate, which is against our rules. If he has a letter he wants to read, I am sure we can do him the courtesy of listening to it, but not another speech, please!

Senator Bosa: Well, I was just making a few remarks before I read the letter.

Senator Roblin: I have to tell my honourable friend that this is not Question Period.

Senator Bosa: I appreciate the observation made by the honourable senator. I would have liked to have praised the Leader of the Government in the Senate—I was speaking in his favour, but, unfortunately, the answers that he gave to the questions that I put to him do not permit me to do so. However, I would like to praise Senator Barootes. He sent me a copy of a letter that he received from the Minister of State for Immigration, which I would like to put on the record. It states:

Dear Senator Barootes:

I am writing in reply to your letter of March 6, concerning Senator Bosa's views regarding immigration and the lack of a reference in the Immigration Act to the multiculturalism and heritage of this country.

While I believe it is not appropriate, and indeed, too late in the day to use the amending process for Bill C-55 to take Senator Bosa's views into account, I do not have any difficulty with the principle. Section 27 of the Constitution makes reference to the multicultural heritage of Canadians and I would think we could find some kind of language to reflect this in the Immigration Act.

Senator Leblanc: Do not read so fast, it is hard for the translators.

Senator Bosa: Oh, I am sorry. The letter continues:

I will be pleased to give this issue full consideration in the amending process that deals with the broader reform of the refugee determination system which we hope to introduce in late spring.

Senator Haidasz: He promised it in the fall of 1985.

Senator Bosa: Well, it says in the late spring in this letter.

Senator Haidasz: What is the delay?

Senator Bosa: The last paragraph states:

As to sponsored immigration, I do not think anything as elaborate as a study is necessary. I will, however, see if our public affairs group can make recommendations on ways and means to enhance the perception of sponsored immigration.

It is signed by the Honourable Walter McLean.

I want to thank Senator Barootes for making this letter available to me and for having elicited a commitment from the government so quickly.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: All honourable senators, I am sure, will have little difficulty in supporting the sentiments which have been prompted by Senator Bosa's request and I thank him for reading that letter into the record. I also want to say that those of us in this chamber who are of an ethnic background are most happy to have the opportunity to bring some of our views to bear at this time.

Senator Bosa: All of us are. We all are ethnics.

Senator Barootes: And as I said, all senators could support this. I am particularly concerned with one or two matters that Senator Haidasz brought up—and we did discuss this earlier. I want to bring to his attention that the very serious and overwhelming problems of refugee redetermination is a process under the Immigration Appeal Board and is presently being addressed by the department in answer to the Plaut report and in answer to the recommendations to which you referred from the House of Commons committee. Moreover, most of us here, I think, have a sympathy and a compassion for the plight of those landed immigrants of special professional status who are in our midst and who are having difficulty in obtaining qualifications which lead to licensure to practise their profession in this country. However, I must point out that such qualifications come under provincial jurisdiction, and that is a jurisdiction which the provincial bodies guard jealously.

● (1600)

When Senator Haidasz raises the problem of a rather superficial treatment of Bill C-55, I am rather hurt because, as he knows, we perused the testimony given at some of the hearings and, indeed, 40 different groups gave testimony on Bill C-55 and a further 40 groups gave testimony to the House of Commons committee on the Plaut report. In addition, on two occasions the department sent its officer and the chairman of the Immigration Appeal Board to testify before our Senate committee.

Senator Haidasz: I said that it was incomplete. There were no questions asked about the costs, present, past or future.

Senator Barootes: We understand the concern Senator Bosa has shown not to lose the opportunity to rectify an omission of long standing regarding multiculturalism in the act. I do point out that he did raise this problem regarding the original drafting of this immigration bill with the Honourable Bud Cullen in 1977 when the bill was under study.

It is obvious that this will not be our last opportunity to consider Senator Bosa's concern. These fundamental reforms, which are necessary to bring in a new refugee determination system, will give rise to a fairly comprehensive overhaul of the Immigration Act at which time the amendments could be more appropriately discussed.

We have before us today, honourable senators, Bill C-55 which is modest in scope to deal with the somewhat urgent problems. It is an interim measure to keep the Immigration Appeal Board abreast of the huge workload and of the broadened reforms which are now necessary since the Supreme Court of Canada decision.

I would, therefore, ask for your concurrence in passing Bill C-55.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C) LAID BEFORE PARLIAMENT FOR THE FISCAL YEAR ENDING MARCH 31, 1986

WEDNESDAY, March 19, 1986

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

FOURTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which Supplementary Estimates (C) laid before Parliament for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1986, were referred, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, March 5, 1986 submits its report as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the following witnesses:

From the Treasury Board:

Mr. J. L. Manion, Secretary;

Mr. D. J. McEachran, Senior Assistant Secretary, Program Branch.

This report includes some material not usually found in reports on Supplementary Estimates by the Committee. This material, included in the appendix to this report has been prepared by Treasury Board at the request of the Committee, and is classified under the following six section headings:

1. Highlights of Supplementary Estimates (C), 1985-86;
2. Summary of Expenditure Framework and Estimates for 1985-86;
3. Statutory Items Included in Supplementary Estimates "C", 1985-86;
4. Summary of Voted Items (greater than $5 million) Included in Supplementary Estimates (C), 1985-86;
5. List of One-dollar Votes Included in Supplementary Estimates (C), 1985-86 and Additional Explanations; and
6. Items in Supplementary Estimates (C), 1985-86 which Materially differ from Information Provided in the 1985-86 Part III.

This appendix is provided in response to requests for additional information about the Estimates, made in the Senate last December, during the debate on the Appropriations Bill, Number 3, 1985-86. The inclusion of sections 5 and 6 is in response to specific concerns raised in previous reports of this Committee; the one-dollar votes has been an area of interest to the Committee for the last few years and a table listing these items has been included in previous reports; the items in the Estimates which differ from information contained in the Part III's is a new issue raised by the Committee in its report on Supplementary Estimates (B), 1985-86.

The Committee also wishes to report that the Secretary of the Treasury Board has acceded to the wishes of the Committee and henceforth will seek to obtain written government responses to any comments or recommendations contained in the reports of this Committee to the Senate on the Estimates.

Supplementary Estimates (C), totalling $1.6 billion is the third and final Supplementary Estimates for the 1985-86 year. Of the total $1.6 billion, $1.3 billion (approximate) is required for statutory purposes, while the remaining $0.2 (approximate) billion is being requested as new spending authority. The thirty-one items which make up the $1.3 billion for statutory programs are briefly described in section 3 of the appendix. Regarding the items to be voted, each of those having a value of greater than $5 million is described in section 4. These items, of which there are twenty-three totalling $188.6 million represent 80% of the total spending authority being sought in these Estimates. The Committee was informed that there are forty one-dollar votes included in these Estimates; twenty-five authorize the transfer of funds from one vote to another; nine authorize the payment of grants; and six are miscellaneous votes. While these miscellaneous votes are described in section 5, the Committee examined two of these and includes a recommendation concerning them.

These Supplementary Estimates bring the total Estimates for the year to $107.2 billion, of which $105.2 is for budgetary purposes. Viewed another way, these Estimates bring the total statutory expenditures for the year to $68.3 billion or 63.7% of the total and the voted expenditures to $38.9 billion, or 36.3%. A summary of the Main and Supplementary Estimates for 1985-86 showing cumulative totals is shown in section 2 of the appendix.

The remainder of this report focuses on some of the specific issues or departmental expenditures which the Committee addressed in its deliberations on these Estimates.

Department of Finance

The Department of Finance requests authority to supplement vote 1C with $8.5 million to support its Financial and Economic Policies Program. The Committee was told that the Department requires approval for $2.1 million to support and provide advice to the Minister of Finance and the Minister of State, Finance for their appearances before the Estey Commission; $2.2 million is required to augment existing funds to meet the costs associated with the May, 1985 budget; and $3.1 million is required to finance the costs of the February, 1986 budget. It appears that these amounts are needed to cover such items as pre and post budget consultations and discussion, regional lock-ups, advertising and information. The Committee questioned the magnitude of these expenditures and has requested that the Treasury Board provide information comparing the costs of these two budgets with those of previous budgets. The Committee also requested a detailed accounting of the costs of the Estey Commission to date.

Privy Council

The Privy Council requests authority to supplement vote 1C with $5.4 million for program expenditures. Of this, $0.5 million is required to meet increased costs for the Ministerial Task Force on Program Review (the Nielsen Task Force). This is in addition to the $1.9 million which appeared in Supplementary Estimates B. The Committee questioned the magnitude of these expenditures and has requested that the Treasury Board provide a detailed accounting of the costs of maintaining this Task Force.

Write-Off and Forgiveness of Debts from the Public Accounts

In these Supplementary Estimates, there are a number of items which either delete or forgive a debt owed to Her Majesty:

Write-Off	($ million)
Department of Finance
Inactive loan to Greece issued under the War Appropriation Act, 1918	$6.214
Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion
Bowmar Canada Limited	0.027
General Drop Forge Limited	0.146
Interline Furniture Limited	0.952
Beaconing Optical and Precision Company Limited	0.016
Radio Engineering Products Limited	1.000
Assemblage Mécanique de Granby Limited	0.080
Canada Cycle & Motor Company Limited	4.935
Consolidated Computer Inc.	12.396
Precision Electronics Components (1971) Limited	0.013

Forgiveness

Department of Labour
Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation Mortgage Insurance Fund	255.500

The authority for write off and forgiveness of debts is found in the Financial Administration Act, section 18(4) and (5). The Committee learned that there is a difference between the forgiveness of a debt and the write-off of a debt; forgiveness eliminates the debt from the Public Accounts and removes any further obligation of the debtor to Her Majesty. Writing off of a debt, while eliminating it from the Public Accounts has the effect of making the loan inactive, but "does not affect any right of Her Majesty to collect or recover the debt, obligation or claim" (Financial Administration Act, 18(4)). The Committee further learned that through an appropriations act, forgiveness of a financial obligation to Her Majesty applies only to debts owed by Crown Corporations. There is no provision under the Financial Administration Act whereby debts owed by individuals or corporations which have become uncollectible, may be forgiven.

The Committee believes that under the principle of equity, individuals and private corporations should have the same rights as Crown corporations with regard to write off or forgiveness of debts and that the government should consider such a change when the Financial Administration Act comes under legislative review.

Respectfully submitted,

FERNAND-E. LEBLANC
Chairman

APPENDIX TO THE REPORT

HIGHLIGHTS OF SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES "C" 1985-86

This Supplementary Estimate, totalling almost $1.6 billion, is the final Estimate for the year 1985-86. It brings total Estimates for the year to $107.2 billion or $106.8 billion net of loan repayments. Of this total, $105.2 billion represents budgetary Estimates. When the anticipated lapse is taken into consideration, the budgetary expenditures for 1985-86 are forecast to be slightly below $104 billion. This expenditure level was reflected in the February 26 Budget and is more than $1 billion below the level forecast at the time the 1985-86 Main Estimates were tabled.

Of the total of $1.6 billion contained in this Supplementary Estimate $1.3 billion or over 80 percent is for statutory items. Parliament is being asked to approve $235 million in new spending authority.

Major items included in these Supplementary Estimates are:

- $875 million for statutory payments to uninsured depositors of Canada Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank made under the Financial Institutions Depositors Act;
- $316 million for statutory contributions to the unemployment insurance account, largely because of higher benefit costs;
- $215 million for statutory equalization payments to the provinces, primarily due to the Supplementary Fiscal Equalization Payments 1982-87 Act passed last June;
- $190 million in statutory payments to the Mortgage Insurance Fund to meet cash obligations under the National Housing Act;

- $101 million decrease in statutory payments to the Export Development Corporation because of lower-than-forecast loan disbursements.
- $92 million for drought assistance to Western farmers (the balance of funding required for this program has been included in the 1986-87 Main Estimate);
- $42 million because of increased costs in education, social assistance and welfare services for Indians and Inuit.

There are two additional points that might be of interest:

- a) These Supplementary Estimates contain forty, one-dollar votes of which thirty-four are entirely financial in nature in that they seek authority to transfer funds between votes or to establish or adjust grants within the same vote. In each of these cases, an explanation of the new requirement and the source of funds is provided in the Supplementary Estimates. The remaining six votes seek specific authorities, consistent with enabling legislation and the Speaker's rulings on legislating in the Estimates. A detailed listing of these votes along with additional explanations is being provided to members.

- b) Supplementary Estimates have traditionally informed Parliament of the person-year requirements associated with the items included. These Supplementary Estimates contain 330 person-years for 1985-86.

This brings the total person-years provided in Main and Supplementary Estimates for 1985-86 to 259,934 or 153 less than comparable levels for 1984-85.

It should be noted that Treasury Board will ensure that person-years included in Supplementary Estimates throughout this year are offset by a lapse of person-year authorities elsewhere in the government and in no way, therefore, will they jeopardize the government's plans to reduce the size of the Public Service. Total Treasury Board-controlled person-years as set out each year in Main Estimates will be reduced by approximately two percent in 1986-87, and by a further one percent each year thereafter for a period of four years. This equates to a reduction of some 5,000 person-years in 1986-87 and a total of 15,000 by 1990-91.

Details of the person-year reductions targeted for 1986-87 are provided in the 1986-87 Main Estimates documents which were tabled earlier this year.

Indian Affairs and Northern Development

Vote 5c—Indian and Inuit Affairs—Operating expenditures—To extend the purposes of Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote 5, Appropriation Act No.3, 1985-86

(a) To increase from $250,000,000 to $350,000,000 the amount of loans that the Minister may guarantee pursuant to Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote 5, Appropriation Act No. 3, 1972; and

(b) To increase from $30,000,000 to $33,000,00 the amount of loans that the Minister may guarantee pursuant to Indian Affairs and Northern Development Vote L53b, Appropriation Act No. 1, 1970

Explanation

1. Loan Guarantees for Housing.

To increase the level of Ministerial authority to guarantee loans made to approved Indian applicants by the Farm Credit Corporation, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and other approved lenders.

Through 1972-73 M.E., Parliament authorized the Minister of INAC to guarantee loans made to Indians by the CMHC, the FCC and other approved lenders for on—Reserve housing to an aggregate amount outstanding at any one time not to exceed $25M. It has been increased several times. These estimates seek an increase from $250M to $350M.

2. Loan Guarantees for Economic Development.

To increase the level of Ministerial authority to guarantee loans for economic development.

To increase the cap on expenditure level for payments on defaults of guaranteed loans under program established in 1969 in support of Indian economic development. Increase from $30M to $33M approved on condition that INAC absorb costs in excess of $30M.

APPENDIX II

ADDITIONAL EXPLANATIONS

Category C—Miscellaneous $1.00 Votes:

Consumer and Corporate Affairs—Canada Post Corporation

Vote 12c—To report the actual excess of operating and income charges over revenues for the Canada Post Corporation in the amount of $347,199,000 for the 12 month period ending March 31, 1985 in accordance with subsection 29(3) of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Explanation—In accordance with section 29(1) of the Canada Post Corporation Act (CPC Act), the Minister of Finance during 1984-85 placed at the disposal of the Corporation sufficient monies to enable the Corporation to meet all its operating and income charges during the year. Section 29(3) of the CPC Act requires that the amount placed at the disposal of the Corporation is to be included, in the form of a deficit appropriation item, in the next Estimates laid before Parliament thereafter. Since the amount placed at the disposal of the Corporation has already been reported as expenditures of the Government in the 1984-85 fiscal year, it cannot be voted as an expenditure in 1985-86. Accordingly, in order to conform with the intent of the Act, a $1 voted item has been included in these Supplementaries to inform Parliament of the actual amount of the Corporation's deficit for 1984-85. The actual 1985-86 deficit will be reported as a $1 item in 1986-87 Supplementary Estimates, again in accordance with Section 29(3) of the Act.

Labour—CMHC

Vote 16c—Pursuant to subsection 18(5) of the Financial Administration Act, to forgive the principal amount of advances outstanding as of 31 December 1985 in an amount not exceeding $255,500,000 made to Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation pursuant to Section 9 of the National Housing Act.

Explanation—Since late 1979, CMHC has been borrowing from the CRF to maintain the liquidity of the Mortgage Insurance Fund. In recognition of the likelihood of CMHC being unable to repay these borrowings, borrowings since August 1984 have been recorded as budgetary. Nevertheless, Section 18(5) of the FAA requires that there be a budgetary vote to forgive an obligation of a Crown Corporation, so the $1 item is to forgive CMHC's obligation to repay advances that were outstanding on December 31, 1985.

Regional Industrial ExpansionVote 2c—Regional Industrial Expansion—

(a) pursuant to Section 18 of the Financial Administration Act to write off from the Accounts of Canada certain debits due and claims by Her Majesty in right of Canada amounting in the aggregate to $19,579,703.27 as set out below;

Debtor	Amount
Bowmar Canada Limited.....	27,200
General Drop Forge Limited.....	146,167
Interline Furniture Limited.....	952,095
Beaconing Optical and Precision Company Limited.....	16,474
Radio Engineering Products Limited.....	1,000,000
Assemblage Mécanique de Granby Limited.....	80,069
Canada Cycle & Motor Company Limited.....	4,935,000
Consolidated Computer Inc.....	12,395,998
Precision Electronics Components (1971) Limited; and.....	13,433

(b) to authorize the transfer of $19,579,703 from Regional Economic Expansion Vote 10, Appropriation Act No. 2, 1985-86 for the purposes of this Vote.

Vote 3c—Regional Economic Expansion—Pursuant to subsection 6(j) of the Small Businesses Loans Act to increase from $1,000,000,000 to $2,500,000,000 to aggregate lending ceiling for the period April 1, 1985 to March 31, 1990.

Explanation—1. Deletion of Debt Pursuant to Section 18 of F.A.A.—Vote 2c

This involves the deletion of uncollectible loans and investments due the Crown in the amount of $19,579,703.27, which are to be recorded in the government's Statement of Assets and Liabilities of Canada. This action is consistent with the government's new debt write-off regulations approved March 1985 (SDR/85-257). Funds are being transferred, via a $1 Vote transfer, from DRIE Vote 10, Grants and Contributions to this new Vote 2c.

2. To increase the lending ceiling under the Small Businesses Loans Act—Vote 3c

Lending activity under the SBLA has increased steadily since 1978, growing from $96M in 1978 to $998.9M in 1984-85. The $1B lending ceiling for the previous lending period of April 1983 to March 31, 1985 had to be increased by $300M (from $1.5B to $1.8B) to meet this growth in demand.

Legislation was passed in April 1985 to establish a new five year lending period for SBLA. The duration of the first $1.0B approved for the lending period was unspecified at that time because it was widely believed that cost-recovery measures introduced in the same legislation would dampen demand significantly. During 1985, demand has remained fairly constant despite these cost-recovery measures and, as a result DRIE has sought approval to increase the ceiling by $1.5B. At present take-up rates (approximately $70M per month) the current $1.0B ceiling could be reached by July or August 1986.

Treasury Board

Vote 21c—Special—To authorize the Minister to pay out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and charge to the National Lottery Account, established by Treasury Board Vote L27a, Appropriation Act No. 4, 1976:

(a) $1.00 for the redemption of the shares of Loto Canada Inc.;

(b) $2,073,360 to the provinces as determined by the Interprovincial Lottery Corporation;

(c) $13,684,174 to the Régie des installations olympiques to assist in the financing of the deficit of the 1976 Olympic Games; and thereupon to repeal the said Vote L27a

Explanation—Wind-up of the National Lottery Account—$1

The National Lottery Account was established through Supplementary Estimates in 1976-77 with the distribution of the funds being 82.5% to the Régie des installations olympiques to assist with the 1976 Olympic Games. 12.5% to the provinces and 5% to federal programs related to fitness and amateur sport. The authority to make payments out of this account has lapsed. This item in Supplementary Estimates is to provide authority to make final payments out of the Account in the same ratios as initially envisaged, totalling $15.8 million as itemized in the vote wording, and to repeal the authority establishing the Account.

Items in Supplementary Estimates "C" 1985-86
Which Materially Differ from Information Provided in the 1985-86 Part III

While the following list may not be totally exhaustive, it includes those items in Supplementary Estimates "C" 1985-86 which are known to significantly impact on or alter information previously included in Part IIIs.

Transport Canada — Payments of $3M towards the Newfoundland Railway Testing and Evaluation Plan for containerization of railway operations The government approved a one year extension to this program, which had been scheduled to terminate last year. This Supplementary Estimates seeks the funds necessary for that extension.

Supply & Services — Source Development Fund ($6.2M) for unfinished but approved projects. The Part III indicated the termination of the Fund effective March 31, 1985. This item will simply allow for the completion of approved projects and represents a cash reprofiling.

PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES—PROPRIETY OF COMMONS REFERRALS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to advise the Senate that next Tuesday I will deliver my statement concerning the proper procedure to be followed when one house wishes to refer a matter to a joint committee, which was raised by Senator Frith on March 11.

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES

APPOINTMENT OF COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, a message has been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate of the names of the members appointed by that house to serve on the Standing Joint Committees on Official Languages, Parliament and Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments respecting the delegation to be authorized to represent Canada at the Conference of Subordinate Legislation Committees of the Parliaments of the States and Commonwealth to be held at Brisbane, Australia, June 4 to 6, 1986.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 2210)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL SYSTEM AND INSTITUTIONS

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION—NOTICE OF MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO ADJOURN TO TORONTO, NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON, D.C. FOR PURPOSE OF STUDY

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985 to examine and report on Canada's participation in the international financial system and institutions, and in particular the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank Group and the regional development banks, including the debt repayment problem of developing countries, be empowered to adjourn to Toronto, New York, and Washington, D.C., for the purpose of such study.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I wonder, honourable senators, if Senator van Roggen could tell us why we should grant leave. Is there any urgency about this at this particular time?

Senator van Roggen: There is only this urgency: Unfortunately, as a result of something that happened yesterday, I have to be in Regina next week instead of here. I had intended to make this motion next week, but now I will not be able to do so. Then we have the Easter adjournment. Having regard to the people with whom the committee would wish to meet with in Washington, officials of Congress, bankers and others, and in New York with senior officials of the IMF and the World Bank, it would require at least a couple of months' work by our staff to arrange meetings for mutually convenient dates. I want to have that process under way during the recess, otherwise we will find ourselves running out of time at the end of June when we would like very much to conclude our testimony for this study so we can start drafting our report. That is my reason for asking for leave today. As I have said, it arises out of a situation that arose yesterday which was unanticipated, as a result of which I cannot make this motion next week. I might add that from a budgetary point of view we will be able to be more precise in the budget we will present to the Internal Economy Committee after we have made some of our arrangements. I have made sufficient preliminary inquiries as to the cost to be able to assure honourable senators that the outside figure for the whole trip would be $20,000 if the full committee were to attend, including staff. That would include all three cities, which we would visit in sequence.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as much as I support my colleague, his committee and its important work, I find as Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, and also as a member of the Rules and Orders Committee, that I have to make an observation about a procedure that those two committees are trying to develop and work out that would prevent the Senate from having to make a decision on the power to hire outside experts or to travel without having a clear picture from the Internal Economy Committee as to what the cost was going to be. The reason for this in principle, without relating it specifically to this motion, is that once the Senate authorizes the hiring of experts and authorizes travel, the Internal Economy Committee and its subcommittee on budgets can really do very little except perhaps pick some nits about total costs and so on, because the chairman of the committee can then quite properly say, "Well look, I have already got authority from the Senate to do this, so it is your job to find the money." The chairman could say that quite convincingly. So the problem is in trying to work this out. We raised this question with regard to special committees as well. The problem is that each time one of these requests comes along, if we let the principle go by, it never does seem to get implemented.

That is why I feel I have to draw the attention of senators to the fact that the Senate itself, as well as the members of the Senate sitting on those two committees, think that the Internal Economy Committee should have the information necessary to assess the costs, and that a report from that committee with the specifics as to cost should be in the hands of senators before the Senate is asked to give the authority requested.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I am fully aware of the fact that the Internal Economy Committee has been endeavouring to move towards a procedure such as Senator Frith now suggests. My understanding is that that procedure has not yet been established. I was advised—possibly incorrectly—that I was following the correct procedure today. If the rules change, I will comply with them.

I did, however, in complying with the spirit of the point Senator Frith has raised, ask the clerk of the committee to find out the price of the air tickets and the cost of hotel accommodation so that we would have an approximate figure.

I also arranged with the members of the committee that we complete this in one week as opposed to making three separate trips. We propose to go to Toronto, then directly from Toronto to Washington and leave Washington the following morning to do our work in New York that day, and then come back the same evening. I asked the members of the committee to undertake the trip in this manner to keep the costs at a minimum, because I understand that the budget is very tight.

In pricing all that out, the cost comes to between $15,000 and $20,000. I mentioned a moment ago that I would give an undertaking that the costs would not exceed $20,000. I gave that undertaking because that is an outside figure. Of course, I will be available to discuss the costs with the members of the Internal Economy Committee in detail to see if they could be less than that.

In addition, I make this observation; it is difficult to appear before the Internal Economy Committee with the dollars and cents worked out until the committee knows what it is going to do, how many people the committee is going to see, and how many days the visit will take. Being conscious of the concern of the Internal Economy Committee, I did that preliminary work on the budget so that I could give the members of that committee an outside figure, and I will undertake to work down from that, not up.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, three points were raised by Senator van Roggen. The first related to whether he proceeded properly. There is no question that he has proceeded quite properly as far as the rules that now exist are concerned. But the question I am raising is based on the application for leave—that is, leave to have the matter dealt with immediately. I assume that Senator van Roggen wants the Senate to vote on this today and give him that authority. It is in that context that I am suggesting that the procedure that all senators hope will come into effect is relevant.

Senator van Roggen is quite right; part of the reason for considering a new procedure—and this has been going on for years, as we know—is the fact that senators hope that committees will, indeed, telephone to check out arrangements and costs so that when the Senate votes on a motion of this kind the mover of the motion can say, "We want to go here, there and there, and we have tentative meetings with this, this and that, and it will cost such and such an amount."

Without wanting to get too rhetorical about it, that is the thinking behind the proposed change in procedure. That is why this motion asking for leave to deal with it immediately raises all these questions.

Senator van Roggen: I am sure honourable senators do not want me to get into a prolonged debate on this with Senator Frith now. I would make the observation—I quite understand the point he is making—that I would be very loath as the chairman of a committee to make a firm arrangement with members of the U.S. Congress, with presidents of large corporations and others for appointments when I do not have the authority from the Senate to make such a trip and to confirm such appointments. If the authority were then not to be given, I think that the committee and the Senate itself would be put in a bad light having to cancel such arrangements. So I did not presume to make arrangements and appointments with people at that level in those cities before having the authority of the Senate to do so.

Senator Frith: That will always be the case. It will always be a chicken-and-egg situation—"Give me the authority and I will then make the arrangements; and then I can tell you the cost." I agree that this is not a black-and-white issue; but, honourable senators, it seems to me that since the spirit of this whole proposal—not the motion before us but the whole proposal—is to give honourable senators a chance to weigh whether or not they wish to give such authority in the context of the cost, the arrangements and how it fits in with the work of the committee, it might be better if we gave honourable senators at least the weekend to think about it and about the observations that have been made. So perhaps leave should not be given to deal with the matter immediately, and we can deal with it on Tuesday after honourable senators have had an opportunity to think about the questions raised.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I presume that leave is not granted.

Senator Frith: That is right, Your Honour. It will appear on the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday.

Senator van Roggen: Honourable senators, I would like someone to deny me leave.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I will be glad to accept that responsibility. I thought it was clear from the explanation I gave as to why I thought honourable senators should have the weekend to consider the matter and suggested that it should appear on the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday.

The Hon. the Speaker: Can I take it, honourable senators, that it will be on the order paper for next Tuesday? Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, March 25, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, there may be other channels through which I should ask this question, but perhaps all honourable senators would like to know if there has been any discussion or if any agreement has been reached with respect to the adjournment prior to Good Friday and the date that the Senate will reconvene, whether it will be one and a half weeks or two weeks later.

Senator Argue: Or prorogation?

Senator Olson: Or prorogation.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I really cannot say with any certainty at this point. Discussions are taking place relating to that matter and we hope to get the matter settled so that we may announce the arrangements to honourable senators next Tuesday.

There is legislation in the House of Commons which we have reason to anticipate will reach us on Monday. There are two appropriation bills which it is hoped we can deal with on Tuesday. There are also two further bills which we understand the government is anxious to have passed. I refer to Bill C-100, the Veterans Allowances Bill, and C-85, the Petroleum Incentives Program Bill. It is hoped that we can deal with them next week. There is also the matter of Bill C-99, the Borrowing Authority Bill. That is out in left field. I cannot honestly say whether or not it will escape the other place in time to reach us before the Easter recess. I should be able to give honourable senators a more definitive answer on Tuesday.

Motion agreed to.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

ARGENTINIAN DELEGATION

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to draw to your attention the presence of a number of distinguished guests in our gallery, namely, His Excellency the Honourable Francesco Jose Pulit, the Ambassador of Argentina, and the following members of the Argentinian delegation: Mr. Ricardo Terrile and Senator Oraldo Britos, who are representing Argentina at the ILO conference in Montreal. They are also visiting our capital.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—ACID RAIN—SCOPE OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the matter of acid rain and the results of the negotiations between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States. He indicated previously that he thought we could look forward to a break-through in terms of a solution to the acid rain problem as a result of those meetings. Now that we know what those meetings have produced, I ask him whether the agreement that was reached in Washington met the expectations that he expressed last week.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I expressed the expectation and hope that we would make progress. I think that expectation and hope have certainly been borne out. If I were asked whether we had solved the problem with respect to the whole question, the answer is positively no, although we have made a break-through in that we have secured the acknowledgement of the President of the United States that this is the kind of problem we think it is. We are going to build on that foundation to secure results that will be completely satisfactory. In order to do that, there will be developments based on known technology in the United States which will, in the near future, have some effect upon the reduction of pollution in Canada. That was clearly anticipated in the joint report the President has approved.

However, I think of somewhat more importance is the fact that there is set in place a continuing monitoring of this situation. The Secretary of State in the United States, the Secretary of State for External Affairs in Canada and other ministers and officials have been mandated to progress this particular problem in the future so that it does not become mired in the shallows; so that we may have a continuing effort, a sincere and serious effort, to deal with the question as it develops in the future. Therefore, I think we have made a very useful start, but I think there is a long way to go before we are completely satisfied.

Senator Frith: Yes, there is no doubt about that, but do I understand correctly that the progress mentioned by the Leader of the Government in the Senate is the recognition by the President of the United States that this is a serious problem?

Senator Roblin: I think it goes farther than that.

Senator Frith: How much farther does it go?

Senator Roblin: I think it goes farther than that, because one has to recall that for the last five or ten years, certainly since the present administration came to power in the United States, we have been endeavouring to secure recognition that this is a serious problem in both our countries. That notion has been resisted for some time, as I think everybody knows.

Senator MacEachen: That was not the situation with respect to President Carter.

Senator Roblin: That has certainly been the case as far as President Reagan is concerned. It is true that President Carter had a different view on the matter, but it was not followed through when the administration changed. Now we have the recognition that this question is viewed by the Americans in the same light as that in which we view it. We also have the undertaking of the President that he will pursue the matter of funding with Congress, because Congress has the authority to provide the funds. He accepts the report of the two emissaries who looked into the matter, which includes proceeding with known technology to deal with this problem to a considerable extent. We think that that will have an effect on Canada in the near future. And we have the follow-up.

I am quite frank in saying that we have a long way to go. We in Canada have a lot to do. For example, in connection with automotive emissions of nitrates and things of that sort, the American regulations are about three times more strict than ours at the present time. We will have to do some work in this country in connection with motor vehicles to try to get the nitrate emission problem down. Pollution is not limited solely to manufacturing processes. A very important aspect of it has to do with the emissions of motor vehicles. We ourselves have something to do there, and we will be doing it. However, the fact that we have a procedure in place to follow up the initiative that has been announced by the President and the Prime Minister today gives us added reason to be confident that progress will be made.

Senator Frith: We certainly agree that we have a long way to go. However, if the Leader of the Government will focus on how far we have come, it seems to me that we have not come very far in the period between the day before the summit and the day after the summit. The report that the Leader of the Government in the Senate refers to as being endorsed would really mean not much more than the action it recommends: That is, a five-year program to develop cleaner ways to burn coal, and that technology is available now. Therefore, it seems to be generally conceded that if we divide the question of acid rain, as it has come to be divided, in terms of the political issue and the progress that can be made by agreement, there are two things that have happened: The first is that there are now recommendations to study it, and that is really all that has happened in the United States. It is true, as my honourable friend says, that funds have been set aside and that more funds will be asked for, but these funds are all to study the question further to find ways, and in some cases to find ways that already exist. In other words, to try to re-invent some ways.

The objection, as I understand it, by the Minister of the Environment and by his predecessor has always been that we have studied the subject enough. The question is, when are we going to do something about it? As I understand my honourable friend's answer, he is saying that we have made progress, but that, essentially, the progress we have made is that the President of the United States has now recognized what seems, I think, to most people to be a blindingly obvious fact and that is that acid rain is a serious international and continental problem. I suppose if the President of the United States really did not previously recognize it as a problem, then, indeed, it is some progress. However, in the context of getting something done, there was no more progress, if I understood his answer correctly, than to support the report which itself simply recommends more studies and more funding to discover ways of doing something rather than actually doing that something. Is that fair?

Senator Roblin: I do not think my honourable friend has got it correctly.

Senator Frith: You don't?

Senator Roblin: No, I don't.

Senator Frith: In what way is that wrong?

Senator Roblin: I think, in the first place, that it is a mistake for my friend not to recognize that there has been a reversal of the policy of the United States.

Senator Frith: No, I recognize that.

Senator Roblin: You recognize that?

Senator Frith: Yes. The progress is that the President recognizes that there is a problem.

Senator Roblin: Very well then, that is a very considerable achievement.

Senator Frith: I do not recognize that.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do, because I say that until you achieved that reversal of policy in the United States, you were out in left field; nothing was going to be done.

Also, for my honourable friend to insist that there is nothing in the report of the two emissaries except the recommendation that there should be research and still more research, he is not correct in that. If you read the report carefully, you will see that they contemplate putting into effect some of the research that is already established as effective. That will be proceeded with in the near future and, as a result, there will be some improvement in the question of transborder pollution. Therefore, I think it would be a good idea if my honourable friend were to recognize that a very useful step has been taken and not try to belittle it. Progress must be made a step at a time. We have secured a reversal of the policy of the United States, which is no small thing, and it provides the basis on which we can do much better.

Senator Frith: That is just not true. We have not secured a reversal at all. I am taking the answer that my friend gave and I am trying to define it, not belittle it.

I understand that the progress that has been made is that the President of the United States has recognized that this is a serious problem. That is number one. Obviously, he has not reversed his policy if he is endorsing a report that was made by someone appointed by him. Therefore, I want honourable senators to understand that that is the progress that my friend is referring to.

As far as the report itself is concerned and the implementation of that report—in other words, getting down to doing something instead of talking about or studying doing something—I read the report and some of the sequels to it and I agree that the report did recommend what my honourable friend has suggested. However, that will require some action from industry in the United States, and industry has just turned that down flat. The Government of the United States is apparently not going to do anything more. I do not want to belittle the progress. I merely want to understand just what exactly is the nature of the progress. Is it progress to say that the President recognizes the problem? Obviously, others in the United States recognize that the problem is an important one. I agree that it is important that the President should recognize the problem, but there is really nothing more to it than that, except for more studies.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that that is the most—

Senator Frith: Truthful and—

Senator Roblin: —unconstructive and unhelpful consideration of the matter that I have heard in a long time.

Senator Frith: What were the adjectives that you used?

Senator Roblin: “Unconstructive and unhelpful.”

Senator Frith: Could I persuade him to do something more perhaps?

Senator Roblin: We have made distinct progress, because up to now the President of the United States, in his capacity as leader of that country, has not recognized this problem. We cannot get anything out of him until he recognizes the problem. That has been done. He has given us his assurances that he will do his best to get the money from Congress to do what is necessary.

Senator Frith: More studies.

Senator Roblin: No, to carry out not only studies, but to bring about the application of what we already know.

Senator Frith: Where does it say that?

Senator Roblin: It says it right here in the report. If the honourable senator will look at page 30, he will see it. I will read the words, “It should also result in some near term reductions in U.S. air emissions that affect the Canadian ecosystem.”

Senator Frith: What should result?

Senator Roblin: Read the report.

Senator Frith: You have given me the verb, but you did not give me the noun.

Senator Roblin: I ask my friend to look at the report for himself.

Senator Frith: You have it right there. Why don't you read it?

Senator Roblin: I read you the statement, and that is exactly what I intend to stick with.

Senator Frith: What is “it”?

Senator Roblin: Fortunately, the honourable senator will find that there is a move in the United States Congress to support the development of this system further. One cannot be sure what will happen to it, but it is certainly good news that the Congressmen of the United States—some of them at any rate—are prepared to proceed with this matter because they now know that they have the backing of the President.

Senator Frith: Would the leader do me the courtesy of telling me what the antecedent of the word “it” is? The leader said, “It should also result in . . .” What will result in?

Senator Marshall: “It.”

Senator Frith: I am told that the part that was read, which apparently was to prove that I had not read the report, says, “it should also result in . . .” What will result in some concrete progress?

Senator Roblin: Technologies that are already developed.

Senator Frith: Exactly, and what are they doing? They are going to study them more.

Senator Roblin: You cannot stop a person from studying if he wants to.

Senator Argue: But they may never graduate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government for clarification on the point which he is making today, that for the first time the President recognizes that there is a problem? I thought that a year ago, on Saint Patrick's Day, there was a great deal of ballyhoo when everybody said, "Yes, the President has recognized that there is a problem, because he has now given Mr. Mulroney a Saint Patrick's Day gift wrapped in green by agreeing to the appointment of a special envoy, Mr. Drew Lewis." That was considered as his recognition that there was a real problem. It is logical, because why in heaven would the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada regard as the major result of the Quebec summit the appointment of two envoys? It was clearly the recognition of a problem, and that was said at the time. Now, the leader has said that we have got them to recognize the problem for the first time. I cannot understand that logic. Does it mean that the problem is now recognized in Washington and that the meeting in Quebec meant nothing? I find that logic extraordinary.

Senator Roblin: I am not finding any difficulty with it. The point that I am trying to make is that the report was prepared and that it was accepted, fully and completely, by the President of the United States. That is something that he certainly did not do on Saint Patrick's Day one year ago.

Senator Frith: He couldn't have—

Senator MacEachen: That is a different kind—

Senator Frith: That is a different kind of logic.

Senator MacEachen: Quite obviously, he did not endorse the report one year ago because it did not exist, but the recognition of the problem arose from the appointment of the two envoys, two very important people. The Leader of the Government has said that the important thing now is the endorsement of the report. But everybody who has written about this matter has said that there is absolutely no guarantee—indeed, there is not even a likelihood—that any action will flow from the endorsement of the report, because there have been no financial commitments from the President, except on the basis of best efforts. No targets have been established for the reduction of the emissions. No timetables have been set. It is an endorsement of a report which may not lead to any results.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Is it not true that the future is as uncertain—

● (1430)

Senator Frith: And as polluted.

Senator MacEachen:—as it was a year ago in that something may happen and something may not?

He has reminded us that Prime Minister Trudeau and President Carter signed a Memorandum of Intent which bound both governments and which the present President ignored. Surely, that was a stronger instrument than anything that was achieved in Washington upon which to base any expectation that the President will do anything. I really want to know what evidence there is that any action will ensue from the endorsement of the report.

Senator Roblin: I think it is extraordinary, indeed, that my honourable friend should imply that the word of the President of the United States is not worth very much, because he, in his statement, said that he would use his efforts to secure the funding required to carry these matters out.

Senator Frith: What matters? More studies.

Senator Roblin: He cannot do it himself; Congress has to help. It is not a parliamentary system, as my friend knows: it is a congressional system.

I am willing to take the word of the President of the United States at its face value and I am quite satisfied and certain that we will see the effective results that my friend is so skeptical about.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I am skeptical because I have seen what has happened in the past. I have seen the United States refuse to ratify a treaty that was signed between Canada and the United States concerning the fisheries and boundaries on the east coast. The agreement had been negotiated and the signatures had been affixed by the plenipotentiaries of both countries, and the President refused to ratify it. I think anything is possible.

Senator Roblin: Of course, that is not quite correct. The President did not refuse to ratify; the matter ran into trouble in Congress, and the President withdrew it. That is what happened.

In this situation we have the President taking the lead. He certainly did not take the lead in the fishery situation, because, if my memory serves me correctly, it was presented to him by the administration that preceded his. In this instance the President has put his seal of approval on and his support behind this question of doing something about the trans-boundary problem with acid rain. I, for one, am quite willing to wait to see the development of events in that regard.

Senator MacEachen: I do not think the recollection of the Leader of the Government is correct. The President dropped the fisheries treaty and notified the Government of Canada that he was not going to do anything about it. Why? It was because of the opposition of two or three senators from the State of Massachusetts in New England. The President was unwilling to pick up a bilateral agreement that had been sanctified by the signatures of plenipotentiaries. He dropped that.

There is nothing in this instance except a verbal endorsement of best efforts to do something that is not yet defined.

Senator Frith: And that "something" means more studies.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will just possess his soul and patience, I think when we come to this time next year he will be able to satisfy himself that this has been a good arrangement.

Senator MacEachen: I hope the Leader of the Government will not then say that "we have recognized the problem and we have taken a big step ahead," because that was said last year.

I should now like to put another question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate who has said that ministers have been mandated to monitor the problem.

The Secretary of State for the United States and the Secretary of State for External Affairs meet quarterly, and I am sure that every time Mr. Clark has met with Mr. Shultz the subject of acid rain has been on the agenda. It was on the agenda every time I met with Mr. Shultz, and that certainly was a monitoring.

What is the new system of monitoring that is going to take, as the Leader of the Government said, this issue from wallowing in the shallows?

Senator Roblin: There is one substantial difference which, obviously, must have occurred to my friend, and that is that in the days of which he was talking, the United States government did not recognize the problem.

Senator Frith: They signed an agreement, so they recognized the problem.

Senator Roblin: My friend can talk that way, but he knows, in practical terms, the present administration did not recognize the problem, and now it does. The President of the United States has mandated his Secretary of State to take the lead with ours in monitoring this matter and getting something done. I think that is a considerable improvement.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is, obviously, issuing a false statement when he says that the administration of the United States did not admit or recognize the problem until this week. If he asserts that, then he is alleging colossal bad faith on the part of members of the administration, such as Mr. Shultz and Mr. Ruckelshaus who was the then Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and who came to Halifax in the company of Mr. Caccia and recognized, as fully as was done yesterday, that a problem existed. They have always recognized the problem. In addition to the presence of Mr. Shultz and Mr. Ruckelshaus in Halifax, and as evidence of their recognition, we also appointed a group of scientists from each of our countries to explore the problem and to seek solutions. It has never been a question of recognition. It is a question of action. What the President did yesterday is what he did in Quebec, and that was to give the appearance to the Prime Minister, but no substance.

Senator Roblin: Of course, when they said that they recognized the problem, the question is: Who recognized it? It was not recognized by the President of the United States, because what happened to Mr. Ruckelshaus when he got back? He was not supported by the President and, consequently, he resigned from his job. We know that is the situation in that instance. For my honourable friend to say that he has nothing but promises or empty posturing on this matter, I think, is very seriously to underestimate the reality of what has happened.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is repeating exactly the line of argument which he and the government made a year ago, which was that they had got something out of the Quebec meeting, but out of Washington has come nothing in the way of guaranteed expenditures, in the way of targets for the reduction of emissions or in the way of a timetable. It is the same pushing of the problem into the future.

The President of the United States has again scored in the marvellous game of sending the Prime Minister away with the ability to say, "I got something," with the President not having given anything.

Senator Roblin: I do not think that statement bears much relationship to the facts. For my honourable friend to maintain, on the matter of money, for example, that we have not received assurances that money will be forthcoming ignores the fact that in the United States it is not the prerogative of the President to do that; he has to go to Congress to get the money.

We have the word of the President that he intends to do that, and I am willing to accept that. Furthermore, I am willing to say that Congress will back him up, because, in the discussions that have taken place, not only recently but on previous occasions, we know that there is a growing feeling in Congress that this question of Canadian-American relationships and acid rain has to be dealt with in a constructive way.

My friend can be as pessimistic as he likes, but I am not going to adopt that attitude.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It is not a matter of accepting the President's word or not, because those of us who cared to listen heard exactly what he had to say at the news conference; it is a matter of the interpretation that is being put on it by the Prime Minister and by the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It comes down to the point that they are indicating that they have got something that they did not have before, namely, recognition by the President of the United States that a problem exists. As has been pointed out, that is exactly the same answer as was given a year ago.

However, there is more to the matter than that. The fact is that there was an international conference on acid rain in Stockholm about three years ago, which I attended. This President sent a delegation, with the leader of that delegation being specially appointed by the President, to say at that conference exactly what the President has said in the last few days, and that is that they recognize a problem that requires more research and that they are prepared to increase the funding for it.

Why does the Leader of the Government now attempt to say that something new has happened when, in fact, it was not new even last year in Quebec City? Months before that meeting, an agreement was signed setting up a scientific committee and, indeed, an international conference at which a representative of this President said exactly the same thing.

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: How can my honourable friend maintain such a position?

Senator Olson: That is right.

Senator Frith: That's the truth.

Senator Roblin: The fact is that a document prepared by the two representatives expressed, in the most explicit, bilateral terms, the situation between our two countries. This document, which is something new, has been accepted, unreservedly, by the President of the United States. He has undertaken to provide the money, as far as he is concerned, to make this thing work. He has agreed that we should set up a bilateral committee composed of senior ministers to monitor this thing and get results in the time to come.

Senator Frith: Monitor; what do you need to monitor?

Senator Roblin: Well, just be quiet. I am answering this question.

Senator Frith: You say he recognized the problems, yet he has to monitor it to find out if there is a problem.

Senator Roblin: Stop interrupting, because you are trying to divert my flow of thought. I know your tactics only too well. I want to say to my honourable friend that I do not think that he has grasped the importance of this matter, but I think that he will live to grasp it.

An Hon. Senator: I think we have been subjected to a lot of flimflam.

Senator MacEachen: How is it all the press men couldn't grasp it? The only two who grasped it were the President and the Prime Minister.

Senator Roblin: Well, that's good enough for me.

Senator Frith: Well, let's say the government.

YOUTH

CANCELLATION OF KATIMAVIK PROGRAM—ANNOUNCEMENT OF NEW PROGRAM

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I start by acknowledging, with pleasure, the presence in his seat of Senator Jacques Hébert, a very brave, courageous and dedicated Canadian and chairman of the Special Senate Committee on Youth which has recently presented a report.

His deputy chairman, Senator Yuzyk, in his speech to the Senate on March 18, said:

We studied the Katimavik program, which has been in operation for ten years, and came to the conclusion that it was a positive and constructive force in Canadian society, even though costly.

The Prime Minister, in response to Senator Hébert's correspondence with him, has announced the government would make more effective use of this money to benefit a wider cross section of youth. My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: When can we expect an announcement from the Prime Minister outlining a youth program that will be accepted as an adequate replacement for Katimavik and meet the objectives of the government, and, indeed, of the committee?

[Senator Frith.]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Well, I can tell my honourable friend that in the last few months such a program has been in effect. There have been several programs, but the one that I intend to refer to is called the Job Entry Program.

The Job Entry Program is a program designed to lead the most difficult sector of our youth into constructive employment and training for jobs. It has resulted in some 285 projects already under way and it encompasses some 9,000 young people. Its price tag is $50 million, to which the $20 million my honourable friend referred to can be compared.

It has been remarkably successful in a number of ways. For example, in Halifax, blacks, whose job opportunities are not what they ought to be, have been given electronics training and have been found jobs in the electronics industry, which is growing in that city. In New Brunswick a number of native youth have been trained to take part in the Power Corps Commission in that province and are being so employed. In Toronto there are some 290 youths who have been trained to take jobs with Control Data and they are also in their jobs now.

So, in at least one aspect of the Job Entry Program we have nearly 250 different projects, we have covered 9,000 people, and we have a price tag of $50 million. That is not the only example. I do not have the precise information with me at the moment, but if I were to go through the other initiatives that the government has taken, it would be seen that it has been substantial. That is not by any means to say that anyone has any right to be satisfied with it, because I am certainly not, but it does indicate the good faith of the government in trying to proceed in this matter to find permanent jobs.

I have nothing against Katimavik as a program. It is simply a question of priorities. I am sure that it has been well received in many quarters, and, if we ever get to the stage where we want to debate that program, there are all kinds of things that could be said about it. However, I am simply saying that it is necessary to recognize priorities to see how you can make the best use of the funds that are available. I suggest to you that we are doing our best to ensure that that happens.

Senator Buckwold: A supplementary question. I, along with many Canadians, believed that there would be a further announcement—and I think the Prime Minister indicated that also. Senator Yuzyk also implied in his speech that there would be some announcement that would, in fact, meet some of the objectives that I have referred to. But I gather from the response of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that the announcements have already been made and nothing further can be expected.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do not think that one can assume that. There is always hope and there is always the opportunity, if funds are available, to do better. We certainly intend to do that. One thing we have overlooked in this discussion on youth unemployment—and it doesn't seem to be highlighted in the report—is the steps that have been taken in the recent past in order to deal with the very problem. They are considerable, not only with respect to youth in the cities, but also with respect to native youth. After all, 65 per cent of the native youth of this country are under the age of 24. That represents a fantastic problem to try to come to grips with. The Minister of Indian Affairs has already instituted a number of programs to tackle this problem. I presume we may detail them some time because, obviously, they do not seem to have registered with many people.

I want to tell my honourable friend that we have not been asleep at the switch. We have been introducing programs that are designed to help young people get permanent jobs—and that is what we all want to do. We also know that in the past few months there has been a substantial decline in youth unemployment. Some 50,000 or so jobs have been developed that were not there before. I say that not to indicate that I am happy, because with 600,000 or so young people in question we can't be happy, but we can say that it represents a degree of progress which, to that extent, must be gratifying.

[Later]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: A supplementary, if I might. Over the weekend, and perhaps this week, the Secretary of State reportedly said, both inside the House of Commons and outside, that an announcement was pending concerning a youth program. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate could indicate any timing for that announcement.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, I cannot, honourable senators.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

STATUS OF WHITE PAPER

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate endeavour to inform the Senate at the earliest opportunity as to the status of the long awaited white paper on National Defence which was heralded, forecast, previewed, and promised by the Prime Minister and several Ministers of National Defence over the last 18 months?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Yes, I will be glad to do that.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure he has read the report of the Bank of Canada and noted the comments of the governor in regard thereto.

In dealing with the subject of interest rates and the comments of the Governor of the Bank of Canada and the policy of the bank in respect thereof, has the leader seen any change in the position of the bank vis-à-vis the position of the bank one year or two years ago?

● (1450)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I must tell my honourable friend that I have not read the report and that I will have to do so before I make any comment.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am sure the leader will be able to recall a statement made by the Prime Minister in Montreal during the fall of 1984. At that time the Prime Minister said that high interest rates were caused by the central bank propping up the dollar, and that that practice would disappear when his government was in full control. Does the leader remember that?

Senator Roblin: There has been a dramatic improvement in interest rates from the time my honourable colleague's friends were in government, when they rose to something like 21 per cent. Since then, interest rates have come down in remarkable fashion. My honourable friend can tell me that since then they have gone up again, and that is right, but they will also come down again.

Senator Sinclair: I am glad the leader raised that point. The real interest rates are at the highest they have been in our history, over 8 per cent. If the leader goes back in history and looks at real interest rates, he will see that they were lower than that.

Senator Frith: So much for that! Don't truck that out again for a month or two.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, one of the things that we did anticipate—and I am sure that the Leader of the Government encouraged us in that anticipation—was that interest rates would come down as a result of the recent budget, but, more importantly, that they would come down because of the relationship between the Canadian dollar and the American dollar.

The budget was presented approximately a month ago, and the relationship of the two currencies has been approximately the same as it was before the budget. So, I wonder when we can expect this big change.

Senator Roblin: I think that if my honourable friend tracks the Bank of Canada rate in respect of interest rate levels over the past several weeks he will see a very decided improvement.

The next fiscal year begins on April 1, and the Minister of Finance has said that he thinks the bank rate will be 9.5 per cent, on the whole, for next year, and I would not be surprised if the Minister of Finance were correct.

Senator Sinclair: I am pleased to hear that because there are many people who think that that will not be the case.

In any event, the leader has said there has been marked improvement. There has been marked improvement from the low, but there has not been marked improvement from the level of interest rates just prior to the budget, and there has not been marked improvement with regard to the relationship of the Canadian dollar to the American dollar. Certainly, it is not at its lowest, which was 69 cents and a fraction, but it is still wallowing, if I may use that expression, at approximately 71 cents and a fraction.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend is always concerned about this, and he has a right to be. He knows as well as I do that the marketplace is a volatile arena and that interest rates go up and interest rates come down. We also know that the reason we have been having a problem recently relates to the value of the Canadian dollar, which has improved somewhat, so much so that the Bank of Canada has, over the past few weeks, been able to reduce its rate consistently. This has been partially reflected in the bank rate, and we expect it will be reflected even more so in interest rates.

So, I refuse to deal with these up-and-down transitory changes in the bank rate as if I were a marionette master and had it on a string and could change it around, because I cannot. The market does that, the Bank of Canada does that, and nobody knows that better than my honourable friend. To say that he should hold me responsible for those fluctuations is stretching the point.

Senator Sinclair: I am not going to hold the leader responsible for anything. But there was an expression of anticipation by the government that following the recent budget our worries would be over with regard to the relationship of the two currencies, and with regard to the highest real interest rates that I can remember, and the highest that the leader can remember as well, I would suggest.

I am asking how long we have to wait. The leader gave me the assurance that I could relax when I heard the budget proposals. Now that I have heard the budget proposals, I am not able to relax.

Senator Roblin: I did not give my friend any assurance whatsoever of that kind because I know better than that. The idea of getting him to relax on the subject of financial interest is a pipe dream, because that is his specialty and I expect to hear from him frequently so that he may give us the benefit of his opinions on the whole subject.

I can tell him that over the past few days there has been a decided improvement. If he will stop picking up the plant to see whether the roots are still growing, he will find that in due course interest rates will come down to the extent that even he might think that progress has been made.

Hon. Lowell Murray: I have a supplementary question, honourable senators. This being a Thursday, it is the day, as honourable senators know, when the bank rate is set.

By way of background to my question, I might say that on election day, 1984, the bank rate stood at 12.38 per cent; on the day of Mr. Wilson's budget last month, the bank rate stood at 11.84 per cent; the day after that, at 11.80 per cent; a week following that, at 11.74 per cent; last week, at 10.69 per cent; and today, at 10.11 per cent.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Sinclair: What has that to do with real interest rates?

Senator Murray: I do not know how Senator Sinclair calculates real interest rates, but there are various ways of doing so, as he knows.

Senator Frith: The way the chairman of the Senate Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee would.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Murray: In any case, he cannot deny the fact that on election day the bank rate stood at 12.38 per cent and today it stands at 10.11 per cent, which is a considerable improvement, and indicates that the overall trend has been downward.

Senator Frith: What were the inflation rates back then?

Senator Murray: I thought that this being a Thursday, Senator Sinclair was rising to express his satisfaction with the progress that is being made in achieving the economic objectives of the government. Since he is too modest to do so, I will ask the leader to convey my satisfaction to the Minister of Finance with respect to the progress that has been made. There is still a long way to go, of course, before we completely clean up the mess that was left by our predecessors.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the leader is going to see the Minister of Finance, would he draw to his attention the inverted rate curve that we are living with now and the dissatisfaction of businessmen, generally, with that situation? Will he also draw to the minister's attention the very difficult situation respecting real interest rates that I have alluded to?

After all, the reason we have low inflation is because of the actions taken by the previous government in bringing measures into effect to direct the trend downward.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: I cannot believe my honourable friend really expects me to take that last observation seriously.

Senator Frith: It is true, but he does not expect you to take it seriously.

Senator Roblin: If my friend examines what has happened to the rates of inflation he will know that one of the biggest contributors to our problem was the fiscal policy followed by the previous government. I am not going to debate that.

Senator MacEachen: No, it is not defensible; it is a stupid statement.

Senator Roblin: I think it is defensible. When my honourable friend is the Minister of Finance, he can have his views.

All I am going to say is that I do not like interest rates to be higher than they must be, but I think my honourable friend should recognize the fact that improvements are taking place. If he is patient, I think that he will find that there will be a further improvement.

Senator Sinclair: I am really surprised at Senator Murray. We have all witnessed the relationship of the yen, the deutschmark and other currencies to the American dollar. Meanwhile, our good old Canadian dollar continues to wallow in disrespect, not only from people at home but from those abroad.

● (1500)

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows perfectly well the reason for that. It is the link between the Canadian and American dollar. The American dollar has declined some 25 per cent over the past few months in relation to the currencies mentioned by the honourable senator. Is he going to hold the Canadian government responsible for that, and the consequent link between our dollar and the yen, the franc, or whatever? Of course not. He would not dream of doing anything like that. What he might say is that because of that particular result, it may very well be that Canadian exporters, at any rate, are in a more favourable competitive position than they were before.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, much as I am enjoying this debate, I think it is a debate and not appropriate to Question Period. May we please revert to Question Period?

Senator Sinclair: Your Honour, I would like to—

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. The practices of this chamber are very clear; the senators are in charge of this chamber. The senators decide what is debate, what is question and what is procedure. I suppose that we are the only institution—I use the word advisedly—where the inmates are in charge—inmates wise or unwise. I hope that the practices and procedures of this body will not be changed by interference from the Chair, without the Chair's being asked to intervene.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I admit that we are in charge of our own procedures, but I think my honourable friend's strictures go a little far—because, after all, what has been taking place during this Question Period is that it has been degenerating into a debate. I have to admit that. So far as I am concerned, at least for the balance of this day, I will try to restrict my answers to “yes” and “no”.

Senator Frith: It may be “evolving” into a debate, but not necessarily “degenerating.”

Senator McElman: On the point raised by Senator Roblin, I would suggest to honourable senators, and directly to Senator Roblin, that if at any point in time he feels that senators are not conducting themselves in the manner in which they should, he is at perfect liberty, as is any other senator, to call a point of order, and to discuss with senators, who are in charge of this house, that point of order. If there is dissatisfaction with the consensus reached by honourable senators following the discussion, then it is quite in order to make a reference to the Chair. But until a reference is made to the Chair by a senator, the practices and procedures of this house do not permit intervention by the Speaker. A point of order is for discussion among senators always, unless it is formally drawn to the attention of the Chair.

I have seen us wandering in many ways, and I have some sympathy with the Leader of the Government in his capacity of answering solely for government policy, and so on. I have real sympathy for that; but the fact of the matter is that we do have long-held practices and procedures in this house which are not spelled out clearly in our rules. I suggest to honourable senators that they should protect very, very carefully and thoughtfully those procedures. They have meaning, they have purpose. We are in charge of ourselves. Let us continue to be so.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am of the opinion that by reasonable and discreet conduct we should avoid the necessity for recriminations in connection with what we do in this house. I have to admit that I have not raised the question as a point of order now or in the past, so far as I can recall, but I have relied on the co-operation and good sense of honourable senators to treat the Question Period in a responsible way. I am making no allegations that senators have not done that, although I believe there has been a tendency to convert it into a free-running exchange of opinion.

Senator Frith: As it was when you were sitting here.

Senator Roblin: All right. That is why I am relying on the good judgment and good sense of my colleagues on either side of the house not to abuse Question Period but to try to respect the function of the Question Period, which is to try to elicit information from me rather than indulge in extensive discourses of a debating nature.

Senator Sinclair: Perhaps I can get a “yes” or “no” answer to this—

Senator Roblin: I have the right to say “maybe”.

Senator Sinclair: When will the government take action to bring down real interest rates?

Senator Roblin: My answer is: The government will follow the best policy it can. I cannot answer “yes” or “no” to that one.

Senator Frith: Therein lies the problem.

MORTGAGES—EFFECT OF BANK RATE AND INTEREST RATES

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, will the minister undertake to bring information to the house concerning mortgage rates and the effect of the current bank rate and interest rates on mortgages—

Senator Frith: Particularly real interest rates.

Senator Murray: —as of today or as of next week?

The latest information I have on this point is that today a five-year mortgage of $50,000, with an amortization period of 20 years, is at 11.5 per cent. The figure as of election day, 1984, was 14.25 per cent. Perhaps the Leader of the Government would investigate the matter next week and bring those figures up to date.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can answer that question in the affirmative.

YOUTH

CANCELLATION OF KATIMAVIK PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE OF CONTENTS OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE REPORT BEFORE TABLING

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to the Leader of the Government. At what point in time was the government informed that the Special Youth Committee would recommend that “the government establish a Young Canadians Community Service Program open to all Canadians aged 17 to 24, either by using Katimavik as a model or by giving Katimavik, now a non-government organization funded by the Department of the Secretary of State, the means to expand"? At what point in time was the government given that information?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government was given that information at the time the report was tabled. I was not aware of it before that.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, unfortunately I cannot substantiate my conclusions, but I have suspicions that the government knew beforehand that the Youth Committee would, in fact, come down with that specific recommendation, and that left the government, in light of the contents of some of the recommendations of the Nielsen report, to decide whether it would kill Katimavik before the presentation of the Youth Committee report or after; and I suspect the government decided that the easier course would be to kill Katimavik before the Youth Committee had an opportunity to table its report in this house. It is a suspicion. I do not have hard evidence. But when I look at the circumstances surrounding that decision, I cannot come to any other conclusion.

In replying to my question concerning youth on March 18, the Leader of the Government said that when the Senate debates the report:

I am sure it will also receive consideration by the government to see what useful ideas can be extracted from it to help the situation.

My question is: Is there, indeed, any sense in debating the total report or part of the report when the government has already arrived at and announced its definite decision to cancel one of the important components of the committee's report? Is there any sense in continuing this debate at this stage?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend will have to make up his own mind on that score. I have no intention of advising him. I have my own views, but I do not wish to inflict them on the Senate. But I have to tell him that I feel rather disturbed that he should tell me that he does not believe me when I tell him that the government knew it when the report was tabled here. That is my firm understanding of the matter, and I want to make it very clear to him that while he is entitled to have whatever suspicions he wishes, so far as I know, and to the best of my ability, they are completely unfounded.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

• (1510)

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I never said that I did not take his word. Indeed, I have to accept an honourable senator's word and I do accept his word. Nevertheless, I am entitled to my own suspicions and I voice those suspicions. I find it strange that the government would, at a time when it knew that the Special Senate Committee on Youth was about to table its report and make recommendations on a wide range of issues, inform Senator Hébert that there would be no further funding to the Katimavik program. I find it strange that it would make that decision publicly known the week before the report was tabled.

Nevertheless, I accept the word of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I cannot challenge it but I simply voice my suspicions. I find that strange.

Then we had the Nielsen report. Why the rush? Why could not that decision await the tabling of the Nielsen report, along with the other recommendations, some of which may have been good, some of which may not have been so good, in the opinion of senators on either side of the aisle. That is why I have my suspicions. I suspect that the confidentiality surrounding the writing of the Senate committee's report was not respected.

Senator Roblin: I would like to tell my honourable friend that I do not appreciate his apology because it merely confirms his original view that I am not telling him the facts. I want to tell him that no member of that committee approached me to tell me what was in the report, which is the clear implication in his remarks. He is mistaken. Nobody did that.

I would like to say with respect to the Nielsen report that there are a number of important matters of government policy referred to in that report concerning which the policy decisions were made by the government before the receipt of it. Does one think, for example, that the Katimavik policy was decided on the spur of the moment? No; it was decided in a review of all of the programs in which the government is interested. That is a process which takes several months. The decision on that matter was, perhaps, announced at a particular time, but that does not mean to say that it was an off-the-cuff decision made in order to thwart a report made by a Senate committee.

If my honourable friend checks the Nielsen report, he will find that important matters—the dairy policy, for example, that is referred to in that report in not very favourable terms—had already been established by the government. The government's decision had been taken even though that report was unfavourable towards the dairy policy.

Therefore, to link the decisions of government policy with the timing of these reports is not the way to go about it, because the government will take decisions regardless of what may be, from time to time, in the public domain. I repeat, those decisions are not necessarily linked to the timing of those reports. I want to say that no member of that committee made any representations to me about the contents of that report. I did not know what was in it until it hit my desk, and that is the fact.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I am not suggesting that it was necessarily a member of the committee who made the facts known to the honourable government leader. It could have been somebody else. I am not suggesting that it would necessarily have been made known to him. It could have been made known to other persons within the government. We know how things work their way up and down within these government circles. Nevertheless, it is rather strange to have this set of circumstances. It is rather strange that the government could not wait three more weeks before announcing to Senator

Jacques Hébert that it was going to kill Katimavik. Did it, indeed, want to spare him more misery by announcing it three weeks ahead of time? Is it the government's view that there would have been more misery if the announcement had been made three weeks after the tabling of the report? That is something that is incomprehensible. Honourable senators can shake their heads as much as they wish, but the committee had the rug pulled from under its feet. Senator Hébert is incensed; other members of the committee are incensed. That was a unanimous report of all of the members of the committee and I believe that the matter would require some further examination.

Senator Roblin: I think that my honourable friend will have to do something better than vent his uninformed and ill-informed suspicions in this house. First, he said the government knew about it, which is false. Then he intimated that some members of the committee told me about it, which is false. Now he says that some servant of the Senate—

Senator Corbin: I never said that!

Senator Roblin: His suspicions are an adequate indication to me of what he really thinks. Those suspicions which he expresses really reveal the way in which he is approaching this matter. Now he wants to say that he has the suspicion that some servant of the Senate or some other person apart from the committee members spoke to me about this matter. That is just as false as the other two ideas.

Senator Corbin: I never said that. I did say that I had no firm indication. I am entitled to voice my suspicions—

Senator Roblin: You are not entitled to such a right when you are wrong.

Senator Corbin: I never expressed the words that you put in my mouth. I never said such things.

Senator Roblin: You said "suspicion".

Senator Corbin: I explained the statement I made.

Senator Roblin: Not very well.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators are intelligent. The government leader may not understand, but other senators, if they look closely at the circumstances, may well come to the same conclusion I have come to.

Senator Roblin: If they do, they will be sadly mistaken.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—U.S. AGRICULTURE POLICY AS AGENDA ITEM

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a non-controversial question. It is really quite a simple little question. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us whether there was discussion at the summit meeting between Prime Minister Mulroney and President Reagan of the agricultural policies of the United States?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I undertook to get further information on that matter. I still have my inquiry out, but I can tell my honourable friend that the matter was discussed by the Prime Minister. Whether it was with the President or with members of the Senate agricultural committee, I am not entirely clear, but the matter was discussed by the Prime Minister with American legislators.

Senator Argue: I accept the Leader of the Government's statement for what he has told me. I wish he would be diligent in informing us whether the Prime Minister of Canada considers the subject of sufficient importance—in relation to other questions of great importance—to be raised with the President of the United States, who is, as the Leader of the Government has pointed out to us this afternoon, the eminent authority in the United States on all of these public questions. With the President on your side, you may or may not get very far. Without him on your side, however, I am afraid that you will get no distance whatsoever. I would appreciate that information.

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS—MARKETING BOARDS

Hon. Hazen Argue: I should like to ask a further question which arises out of a news item I heard on the radio. I cannot vouch for its accuracy, but to my recollection it was something to the effect that the Prime Minister has said that he recognizes that agriculture in Canada is having serious problems. One of the ways in which he would hope that these problems could be addressed would be in the forthcoming free trade conference. That is simply my paraphrasing of the radio report. However, to be more specific, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether there will be discussion in the free trade talks of Canada's policy of having in place marketing boards for such important commodities and products as chickens, eggs, turkeys, dairy products and wheat. I would like to have the assurance that there would be no negotiation about the Canadian right and the Canadian wisdom in following these policies involving marketing boards. There is a great deal of fear out there among agricultural people that these free trade discussions may spell disaster for their industry. I have found that that is a genuine fear.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that that fear will be found on both sides of the border. I think that the American agricultural interests are just as disturbed about the idea of their particular arrangements being upset in these negotiations as are some of our people. I am sure that it will be the aim of the negotiators on both sides to make sure that the legitimate interests of agriculture—which are not exactly identical with ordinary concepts of free trade, as I think we all recognize clearly—are adequately considered and protected.

● (1520)

Senator Argue: Can the Leader of the Government give me a further assurance that there will be no endeavour by Canada to bring about free trade between our two countries in the commodities that I have just mentioned? Such free trade would be a disaster for our producers.

Senator Roblin: Those considerations will be very important in the minds of the negotiators, and I am sure that they will be interested in protecting our interests in that respect.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Inquiries:

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, March 25, 1986, I will call the attention of the Senate to Greek Independence Day.

THE SENATE

OFFICIAL REPORT—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if it is appropriate, I would like to rise on a point of order with respect to the transcript of my speech yesterday on Bill C-70. I have great difficulty in reconciling the account of my speech on page 2178 with what I actually said, and I will need to do some re-writing of the original notes in order to replace this at an appropriate time later, because it really does not make a great deal of sense. Perhaps it did not make much sense when I said it, but whatever sense was there has been removed in this rendition.

Senator Frith: Perhaps it made sense in a different way.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (C) 1985-86), presented in the Senate on March 19, 1986.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc moved the adoption of the report.

He said: Honourable senators, during the discussion in December 1985 on the report of the Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (B), a number of senators raised some very important points. Senators Doody, Frith, MacEachen, Everett and Flynn took part in the debate on December 11.

On December 17, when the same report of the Committee on National Finance on Supplementary Estimates (B) was on the agenda, Senator Kelly provided some clarification of the committee's report. Senator MacEachen intervened to raise certain points, as did Senators Roblin, Doody and Frith.

When Appropriation Bill No. 3, 1985-86, subsequent to Supplementary Estimates (B), was debated in the Senate, Senator Frith made several suggestions for the future format of reports of the Committee on National Finance concerning the study of Supplementary Estimates. In response to comments by senators, I would like to mention that the staff of the Committee on National Finance and myself had several meetings with Treasury Board officials and with Mr. Manion to discuss how we could improve future reports of the Committee on National Finance.

As a result, we agreed on a number of points, and this is reflected in the report I tabled yesterday on Supplementary Estimates (C). The report tabled yesterday is entirely different from previous reports. I hope that this entirely new approach will meet with the approval of senators who are concerned about the way in which reports have been presented in the past.

Regarding this Fourteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, I would like to point out that we appended six different section headings to clarify the relationship between Supplementary Estimates (C), previous Supplementary Estimates and the Main Estimates. The headings were provided by Treasury Board.

Furthermore, in accordance with the wishes of the committee, Treasury Board, or rather Mr. Manion, mentioned that henceforth he would try to obtain written responses, not only to the questions put during consideration of the Estimates and to which they are not prepared to reply orally (which is what they do at the present time) but also to any recommendations contained in the committee's report. This formula is an innovation, because in the past, the report's recommendations were either implemented or set aside by the Government, without the committee being advised either way.

In future, we will obtain in writing any comments or recommendations contained in reports from Treasury Board.

We focussed on certain specific expenditure items. I may add that we also examined those of the Department of Finance. We questioned the magnitude of certain expenditures. The committee asked Treasury Board to provide information comparing the costs of these two budgets, the May budget and the latest budget we have had.

We also requested a detailed accounting of the costs of the Estey Commission to date.

We also raised the matter of the expenditures incurred by the Ministerial Task Force on Program Review, the Nielsen Task Force. Here again, the committee asked Treasury Board for a detailed accounting of the costs of maintaining this task force.

We also discussed the write-off and forgiveness of debts from the Public Accounts. We learned further that through an appropriations act, forgiveness of a financial obligation to Her Majesty applies only to debts owed by Crown corporations. We also found there is no provision under the Financial Administration Act whereby debts owed by individuals or corporations which have become uncollectible, may be forgiven.

The Committee believed that under the principle of equity, individuals and private corporations should have the same rights as crown corporations with regard to write-off or forgiveness of debts.

Since in December we had raised the point that the appropriations bill and items in the Supplementary Estimates differed materially from information provided in Part III of the Public Accounts, we have appended two specific items to our report, namely Transport Canada and Supply and Services, where expenditures differ materially from information provided in the 1985-86 Part III. Thank you, honourable senators.

● (1530)

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words on the report. They are mainly words of congratulation to the chairman and his staff who have done a remarkable job in answering the requests of senators for a changed type of report and for the added information that is demonstrated in this example. The highlights of the supplementary estimates which are listed here have always been with us, but the extra information on the summary of voted items greater than $5 million is new. Each item greater than $5 million that is voted upon is listed separately in the report. The officials of the Treasury Board informed the committee that this $5 million is an arbitrary figure which they picked, and that if honourable senators wished it to be another figure they would be only too happy to oblige us. I think that this is a marked improvement.

I note that the list of $1 votes is just as long as ever, despite our reservations about these items in the past. However, additional explanations are available this time, which is something we have not had in such abundance before. The items in the supplementary estimates which differ materially from the information provided in the 1985-86 Part IIIs are listed here in detail. We received a great deal of explanation in committee which we never received before. I noted also that the officials from Treasury Board were very forthcoming in promising written responses to questions when they did not have the answers with them. I am sure that in the spirit of this particular report, they will be forthcoming very quickly.

I simply want to say at this time that this report is a marked improvement. I for one am very pleased with it. I look forward to seeing the same sort of co-operation from Treasury Board in future reports.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

SENATOR HÉBERT—HUNGER STRIKE—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order which I trust is of interest and should be of concern to all members of the Senate. For more than two weeks now the Senate has officially, indeed studiously, ignored the demonstration by one of our colleagues in the foyer of this place. I am speaking of Senator Hébert who has embarked on a hunger strike concerning an issue that is of great concern to him.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask Senator Murray to excuse me. I should have been paying attention to him at the outset. What are we listening to?

Senator Murray: I am speaking on a point of order. It seems to me that there are two questions to which the Senate should address itself. The first is the question of whether it is permissible for an honourable senator to conduct a demonstration of this kind, or of any kind, on the premises, and whether that is part of his rights and privileges as a member of this chamber. That is a matter to which sooner or later, because of the precedent that could be established by the honourable senator in this case, the Senate will have to address itself.

The second and more important matter is the purely human question of the health, and indeed the life, of a colleague.

Honourable senators, we are reminded from time to time that we are the masters of our rules, that we are the people who decide who governs what takes place here—and by “here” I mean not only in this chamber but, and I believe this to be obvious, on the premises in this part of the Parliament Buildings. We are in charge of this place, collectively. Indeed, we were reminded the other day, in another connection, that His Honour the Speaker does not have the kind of authority on this side that his counterpart in the House of Commons has on that side of the building. So we are collectively responsible for what takes place on the premises here.

That being the case, each of us, no matter how junior, is responsible for what takes place here. Not to confront the issues—at least, those two issues that are raised by the gesture of our friend and colleague—it seems to me, is to fail in our responsibility, in our individual and collective responsibility as members of this chamber.

I wish I had a solution to suggest to honourable senators, but I do not. However, I think the time is long past that we, as members of the Senate, should confront the issues. Perhaps honourable senators would be disposed to the idea of a resolution of the Senate, whatever the merits of the substance of the issue at hand, calling on our colleague to desist. Perhaps the Senate would be disposed to the idea of going into Committee of the Whole to discuss the matter; perhaps the Senate would be disposed to the idea of referring the matter to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee or to the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee, over which Your Honour presides. I suppose I agree that Your Honour does not have the kind of authority that your counterpart has in the other place, but we do have leaders in this place and there is a certain moral authority, surely, that exists in the office of Speaker. We have a Leader of the Government; we have a Leader of the Opposition in whose caucus our friend sits. Perhaps the Senate would be disposed to the idea of asking those three senators and/or other senators to take the matter under urgent advisement.

But, honourable senators, we leave here tomorrow, I am given to understand, for the Easter break. In whose hands do we leave this matter? We leave the matter in the hands of the protective staff to confront what is potentially a medical emergency and one with strong political overtones, if I may put it that way. That seems to me to be hardly fair.

In any case, as I say, I wish I had a solution; I do not have a solution but of one thing I am certain and that is that the members of this Senate, individually and collectively, are responsible for what happens here and we would be failing in our responsibility if we did not address the issues.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, speaking to the point of order, Senator Murray made two points. He first raised the question of the permissibility of what is taking place and whether it is within the privilege of a senator to do what Senator Hébert is doing. He then raised the question of the health of our colleague and the need to confront what is taking place. In my view, he answered the first question with his remarks on the second one. In my opinion, there is no question that it is within Senator Hébert's privilege to do what he is doing and, as Senator Murray has said, only the Senate can take that privilege away from him.

I agree that there is a collective responsibility, but I do not agree with him that it is a collective responsibility for what takes place as much as it is a collective responsibility for what we permit to take place. In the absence of any resolution on the subject, our responsibility is simply to confront any proposals about the issue that was raised by Senator Murray, and that is whether the Senate wishes—as it is entitled to do—to take any action relating to Senator Hébert's privilege.

In the absence of any resolution or motion, I think that all we can do is deal with the point of order on the basis suggested by Senator Murray, and that is take our own counsel as individual senators and take counsel with our caucuses.

Senator Murray suggested certain concrete action by way of a resolution, for example. I take it he is not proposing such a resolution but may be disposed to do so. His invitation, if that is what it is, to someone to make such a resolution has, of course, been heard and recorded and that is a possibility. However, on the point of order, that is all I think that I can relevantly say.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Perhaps I could join in this discussion, honourable senators, because I personally feel a very heavy load of responsibility for what is going on these days. Senator Murray, quite rightly, said that the Senate has studiously ignored this problem during the past two weeks. I want to make it clear that I have not studiously ignored it because it has been a matter of deep concern to me since the very beginning. I have been searching for some way which would appeal to our sense of the fitness of things and, I hope, to the comradeship of Senator Hébert, that would enable us to bring this episode to an honourable and a fitting conclusion.

There have been meetings with the Speaker and the leadership on both sides of the house in the last little while. This subject was canvassed at those meetings and the question as to how it might be resolved was discussed. Without wishing to disclose any confidences, which would be perhaps wrong of me to do, I can say that we did not find any happy issue out of this affliction and we did not find a meeting of minds in those meetings which would give me some expectation that all sides of the Senate—and every senator, if I had my way—would unite on a solution to the question that is before us. I want to make it clear that while I am leader of the house, I am conscious of the moral responsibility that I have. I sought to satisfy that responsibility as far as I could, but I have to admit that I have not the authority as Leader of the Government to take action. Neither does the Speaker, because the Speaker here is not like the Speaker in the House of Commons—he is not elected by the Senate. He can descend from the Chair if he wants to and take part in the debates and vote—quite a different situation from that of the Speaker in the House of Commons.

Senator Murray is right in saying that it is only the Senate itself that can act in this matter in an authoritative manner, because only the Senate itself is clothed with that authority and with that responsibility. That was why I was conducting discussions, in the hope that the two sides of the Senate would recognize a joint responsibility and try to do something about it. Perhaps this initiative of Senator Murray will give new impetus to that possibility.

I am exceedingly concerned with the fact that tomorrow, Wednesday, we will leave this place for one week and maybe longer. We face the possibility of circumstances arising that would be very painful for all of us to contemplate. I don't know what the correct course to follow is. If I had my way, I would like to see the Senate come to a meeting of minds on this—not on a political basis, and in complete disregard of the political issues involved, because they are debatable. What is not debatable is that we are concerned about the health and welfare of our colleague. It is on that ground that I think the Senate might unite.

I would hope that if Senator Hébert found out that that was the feeling of his colleagues in this body, he would put aside his strong and honourable personal feelings in the matter—because I believe they are strong, and I am sure they are honourable—in deference to the health and reputation of the Senate as well as the concern of those of us who sit in this chamber.

I think that the political side of this issue has been very well ventilated in the past two weeks—there is no question about that. It may be that we need some method of breaking the logjam that will enable us to deal with this matter in a way which avoids leading to irretrievable conclusions, and make it possible for the matter to be resolved in a friendly and peaceful fashion.

I believe in peaceful persuasion. We have no rules in this body to speak of, and the reason we get along and why it works is because there is a set of unwritten rules, a sort of understanding, about what we should do and say to each other. Sometimes we kick over the traces, but, on the whole, in spite of my reservations about Question Period, we do manage to get along in a relatively harmonious fashion, although we have not only two distinct points of view on every subject but a great many more. Senators try to be a little independent when it comes to discussing issues. There is a spirit of fraternity in this house and that is what makes it work.

I would like to recapture that spirit, because if we are to proceed into the future in a fraternal and friendly way, we must do what we can to recapture that spirit of fraternity.

I do not say this in any way as a criticism of Senator Hébert, because everyone follows his own star and has the right to see the situation through his own eyes. That is the right of every one of us, and I freely accord the same privilege to Senator Hébert in that respect that I would ask for myself.

Having said that, I hope that we can come to a meeting of minds in which all of us, by and large, can concur and in which we can ask Senator Hébert to listen to our plea that he change his present course of action.

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition has made the suggestion that we should consider this matter in caucus. I think that is a good suggestion. If I had my way, I would adjourn the chamber right now and go ahead with it. If that does not meet with the approval of the chamber—and I know we have some important business on our agenda—I think that after the house rises today the caucuses should meet and then the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—or whoever the Liberal caucus deems appropriate—should be invited to talk with the Speaker and myself to determine what the feeling is after the matter has been discussed in caucus. I will certainly undertake to do that on this side of the house.

I do not know whether there is any light at the end of the tunnel, but I think it would probably be a good thing if the Senate were to take this matter under notice and advisement; agree to discuss it in our caucuses later on today; and, before the day is over, we should meet with our various representatives to see if we can find a common, united and agreeable course of action.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, this is, obviously, a most troublesome question for all senators. I think Senator Hébert, after a great deal of thought and consideration, has come to his own conclusion. I think he is in support of a noble cause, a cause that does command widespread support across the country.

One wants to arrive at a solution and one wants to deal with a problem. However, I hope that in our consideration of the problem and in our efforts to arrive at a possible solution, we cast our minds beyond the Senate itself to the fact that there is another aspect to this whole question, and that is the aspect of the attitude of the government and of the Prime Minister.

It is easy for one to say that the action of Senator Hébert is not justified on the ground that it is one person trying to impose his will on the majority, but I would remind honourable senators that we do live in a free country, and it is part of that freedom that each one of us Canadians has the opportunity from time to time to take action—whether it be workers who go on strike or organize a demonstration of one kind or another—to put forth a point of view even though it may be a point of view much different from that held by the majority. I hope very fervently that what is happening now will result in benefit to our country. When somebody says to me, as has sometimes been the case, “Why should one person set himself up in opposition to the majority?” I think of another situation.

I am involved in an industry that is going through very great tribulation today, the agricultural industry. Some farmers in that industry, some of whom were not very far from my home, decided that their way out was suicide and so they took their own lives. I suppose that that is their right, but it is certainly not the way out that I like to see taken. I hope that people who are considering that terrible course will reconsider and perhaps as an interim measure or as an alternative measure go on a hunger strike. If enough farmers went on a hunger strike, it would bring the problems of that industry very vividly before Canadians.

My suggestion—and I put it forward humbly—is that the Prime Minister do everything he can to bring himself to make an announcement—an announcement that in real terms is a substantial one—dealing with this whole question of youth and youth unemployment in a broad and meaningful way. I suggest that in that statement he should indicate that action will be taken in the very near future. After having established that the government is proceeding in a meaningful way, it might well be possible for Senator Hébert to rethink his position and to ask himself whether or not he has in fact accomplished something very tangible. While it might not meet the precise definition of everything he would like to see accomplished, nevertheless, perhaps he will be convinced that the announcement of broad improvements in real terms will in fact help the youth of the country. I see this proposal as a possible solution and as a possible way out, as opposed to some other solution which might be simply a Senate solution separate and apart from real and meaningful action on the part of the government.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I want to be sure that my position as I expressed it is understood. I was speaking to a point of order. I pointed out that among the alternatives that presented themselves was individual and collective counselling on the question raised by Senator Murray. I do not want to give the impression that if the matter is discussed in our caucus it will be the first time it has been discussed. I must also say, without speaking for our caucus, that while I am prepared to discuss it with my colleagues, I personally have no enthusiasm for any collective action by the Senate that will interfere with Senator Hébert's privileges as he is now exercising them or that will in any way go against his wishes.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I would like to add a short comment to what has been discussed here. With regard to Senator Argue's comments, and perhaps at a later time, I would like to discuss the distinction I see between strikes and demonstrations and killing yourself or killing somebody else on the basis of an ultimatum. I think that is for another day. My concern today is that we are talking about a colleague.

I have mentioned in many meetings that my perception of the Senate is still based on what I see in the Senate, honourable men and women, individual people, addressing the issues of the day. I cannot agree at all with the suggestion that this be discussed by the caucuses. I find that suggestion making me restless. This is not a caucus matter; it is a matter for the Senate to consider. Senator Hébert is present. He knows my feelings because I have expressed them to him before. I am pleading with him, as are all his colleagues, to consider his life, and the value of his life. He feels strongly about this question, and I understand that.

But that is not the issue I see before the Senate; the issue before the Senate is the concern we have for a valued colleague. We should be trying to find every possible way to persuade him to continue to push this issue in every way possible, short of risking his life. That is the wrong way to go about it. That is wrong for the Senate, and the Senate will lose a valued member if he should die.

I am not persuaded by anything I have heard that we have gone beyond deciding that we, perhaps, should at least be concerned. No one has told me precisely what happens if on Thursday or Friday of this week Senator Hébert goes into some kind of a coma. Do we then have caucus meetings to decide how we should handle that? Surely, this is a time when each of us, if he or she has not done so, should be saying to Senator Hébert: "Please reconsider your decision."

The issue is not Katimavik, the issue is Senator Hébert.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, Senator Hébert has made it clear that he feels that the right of young people to better attention by society, to a role, to a job, is a right worth fighting for. In his view, it is worth laying his life on the line.

There is a precedent of a person who considered that there was an issue worth laying one's life down for, and that was Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst who, in Britain between 1903 and 1918, went on hunger strikes to obtain a right she considered sacred, the right of women to vote. The government arrested her repeatedly and force-fed her, but when she came out of prison, she would go on another hunger strike.

I have been doing some research on this matter, and all of the arguments I have read about a hunger strike being the wrong weapon, being para-democratic, were used in that case. In retrospect, I doubt that any of us would say today that Emmeline Pankhurst was not right. She went on a hunger strike to obtain that right.

I accept that the motives of Senators Murray, Roblin and Kelly, are noble, as are the motives of everyone else. I share their concern for the health of our colleague, but I want it to be quite clear that this is a matter of Senator Hébert's making a decision, and unless he makes a decision to stop the hunger strike we are bereft of any recourse. What could we do? Force-feed him? Evict him? Isolate him? I doubt that there would be a majority within the Senate's two caucuses for any of those courses.

So, we are really in Senator Hébert's hands. I share the concern of my honourable colleagues for his health; I hope that his health will be preserved, but I do not see how we, whether we meet in separate caucuses or whether we meet in the Senate as a committee of the whole, can find any solution that is not utterly dependent on Senator Hébert's changing his mind.

GREEK INDEPENDENCE DAY

On Notices of Inquiry:

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes rose pursuant to notice of Thursday, March 20, 1986:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to Greek Independence Day.

He said: Honourable senators, it is my privilege and honour to draw the attention of this honourable chamber to the fact that today is Greek Independence Day.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Barootes: It is the commemoration of that day in 1821 when Greece, under the courageous leadership of Mr. Kolokotronis, a famous warrior, threw off the yoke of the Turkish Ottoman rule.

This past weekend, with an enthusiasm and an emotion that typifies the Greek spirit, the occasion was celebrated in virtually every city in Canada with parades, rallies, dinners, speech-making and a variety of patriotic gestures, not by just Hellenic Canadians but by all Canadians.

Last Saturday in Toronto I was privileged to participate in a parade on Danforth Avenue comprising thousands of fellow Greek-Canadians and witnessed joyfully by overflowing crowds in the tens of thousands. It was a most colourful and patriotic demonstration of the Greek tradition woven into our Canadian tapestry.

In the parade later on the Toronto streets, and that evening at a dinner in a Toronto hotel, it was pleasing to see so many members of Parliament, members of the Ontario Legislature, and political figures from all levels of government, and of all parties in this country, congregating so wholesomely with the Ambassador of Greece, with the Greek Consulate officials, and with Bishop Sotirios of the Greek Orthodox Church of Canada—as well as with many other community leaders of Greek ethnic origin.

Similar commemorative exercises are being held in centres across Canada. Today at noon, in a striking and colourful ceremony, there was the raising of the Greek flag at Ottawa City Hall in the presence of many local dignitaries.

It is of some significance to note that today Greek-Canadians exceed the figure of 250,000 and constitute one per cent of our Canadian population. As honourable senators would expect, their consistent loyalty to western democratic causes has resulted in their assuming an increasingly important role in our society: in business, in municipal, provincial and federal affairs, in the various professions, the judiciary, and in all elements of our community life.

I personally look forward with great anticipation and great pride to the leadership and contribution which the coming generation of this group will bestow on the progress of our country.

Honourable senators will be pleased to know that on April 12 and 13 of this year we will be marking the formalization and founding of a national Hellenic-Canadian congress in Ottawa-Hull, bringing together under one umbrella organization several hundred individual Greek-Canadian societies, community groups, fraternal, church and self-help organizations, as well as ethnic schools and many other Greek institutions. I am pleased to say that this Congress has been encouraged by the Government of Canada and that a grant from the multicultural department has been awarded to assist with its founding. Henceforth, this Congress will be able to represent and deliver the views and advice of a consensus of Hellenic Canadians to our governments with a formal and unified voice.

Honourable senators, I need not dwell with you on the glories of Greece, nor do I need to reflect on her contributions. Mankind and civilization have recognized most generously the contribution made by ancient Greece and by its Golden Age to the classics, to the arts, to sculpture, to architecture, to literature, to poetry, to science and medicine, to philosophy, reason and thought and even, unfortunately, to warfare and conquest. Indeed, Greece formulated the very substance of modern civilization.

Perhaps the most prized of Greek traditions and heritage which was contributed was the basis of free, elected and democratic government. That, honourable senators, is why this day, March 25, is so important to Greeks and, indeed, to all of us because, despite Greece's devotion to democracy, she was for hundreds of years subjected to external rule by an autocratic and despotic regime. That is why the relief of that oppression by the courageous leader Kolokotronis, deserves—may I say demands—of Greeks everywhere and of all people in all countries; all people who believe in democracy, that they observe this day with celebration. It symbolizes that the cradle of democracy cannot be overturned and suffocated by totalitarianism.

The modern history of Greece is not as happy as that of ancient times. She has suffered many problems: invasions, occupations, dictatorships and economic difficulties. But always she has returned triumphantly and gratefully to democratic regimes, although frequently poorer and saddened by her experience.

So, honourable senators, in that vein I close by recalling the lament of Ulysses in Alfred Lord Tennyson's immortal and prophetic poem: Immortal because of its timeless beauty of expression; prophetic because it applies as much today to Greece as it applied to the aging hero of its title:

Tho' much is taken, much abides; and tho'
We are not now that strength which in old days
Moved earth and heaven; that which we are, we are;
One equal temper of heroic hearts,
Made weak by time and fate, but strong in will
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I would like to point out to Senator Barootes that, in the order of business, we were at Notices of Inquiries. However, as no honourable senator objected, I let him continue.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I only want to bootleg my congratulations to Senator Barootes on his intervention and also on the occasion that he celebrated in that intervention. On a point of order, I would mention that the notice of his inquiry appeared towards the end of the order of business, under "Inquiries", and we were all looking forward to hearing it under that heading. I would like the record to show that that is normally where we would have heard it.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I apologize for my intervention at the improper time.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: It was a most proper intervention, however, and although Greeks have traditionally been disunited, those things on which Senator Barootes and I are united far outnumber those on which we are disunited. I was delighted when the Prime Minister appointed him to the Senate. It felt a little lonely being the only Hellene in this chamber and now there are two of us.

The Hon. the Speaker: If no other honourable senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

YOUTH

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): The question of the government's policy on youth is still a very active one in this country. I am hoping that by putting a question to him, I will give the Leader of the Government in the Senate the opportunity to clarify the government's policy on one aspect of the question of youth unemployment and the situation of Canadian youth.

My question is prompted by some apparent disagreement between the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister. I understand from reading the transcripts in the other place, and their quotation in the press, that Mr. Bouchard—and in fact I heard him on television yesterday—stated that the government will not be able to announce a new youth policy by April 1.

[Senator Barootes.]

Last Friday, in the House of Commons Debates, at page 11743, the Prime Minister, in answer to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, said:

I said in the house three weeks ago, on March 3, and I said it again on March 11 and in other circumstances even before this matter was raised, that the Government intended to take action at a given time, towards the end of the fiscal year.

That is in comparison with Mr. Bouchard's saying that he will not be able to take action before the end of the fiscal year. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether that contretemps has been resolved in the meantime and, if so, can he tell the Senate what the resolution is?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I suspect that the difference of opinion is more apparent than real, but I am not able to elucidate it at the present time.

Senator Frith: Will the Leader of the Government be able to obtain that information for us before we adjourn tomorrow?

Senator Roblin: I have a hunch that it might be discussed in the House of Commons this afternoon, which might give me an opening on the matter.

Senator Argue: Would that be a government hunch or an opposition hunch?

Senator Frith: Perhaps the Leader of the Government could also obtain for us an explanation for another statement made by Mr. Bouchard in which he says:

We have only been working on this problem for one month and I don't believe it's possible to have something in terms of March 30.

March 30 was covered in my first question, but my question out of that statement is that I had understood that the government was giving very high priority to this matter. How is that reconciled with the fact that, as the Secretary of State says, the government has only been working on this problem for one month?

Senator Roblin: I do not know what the minister meant when he made that statement, but I do know that with respect to questions of youth the government has been working strenuously for some time and I can report to the house that, in addition to the success of the job entry program which I spoke about on Thursday of last week, in which some 9,000 young people who are in classes usually difficult to employ have been put into training positions with very sound prospects of its leading to permanent employment,—in addition to that program, which is particularly noteworthy, I should also report to the house that there are some $700 million in the present budget for training and employment qualifications for youth. This covers in excess of 200,000 young people, so that is a pretty significant program to have working.

There are a number of other programs which are effective. There is a financial assistance program to help students start businesses; there is a co-operative education option which, it is thought, will help approximately 40,000 young people to obtain jobs in the private and public sectors in which the educational factor will be significant. There is the Challenge 86 Program which is going to be operating this summer and will employ about 100,000 young people. So it would not be true to say that the government is not taking this problem seriously.

Now, we all know that there are never enough programs of this kind. I make no bones about that. I do know that, as I have said in this house before, youth employment has improved. It has improved by around 73,000 new jobs in the last 18 months or so. That still leaves a very large number unemployed, but it does represent progress when you consider that we lost about a quarter of a billion jobs during the late unlamented depression, so catching up on that and overtaking it certainly represents quite a change in the situation in the last little while.

So, while I am not going to maintain that the problem has been solved, because it has not, I am going to maintain that the government has taken a very serious view of this matter and has launched programs which we think will be very effective. Probably the Secretary of State is looking for other initiatives and, if so, I certainly hope he finds some.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senator, that answer and those comments do certainly focus on the very statement that I was referring to. The statement is: "We have only been working on this problem for one month."

So will he find out what it is that the minister meant by "this problem"? In light of what the Leader of the Government has said, I take it that he has been working on some problem for more than a month to produce the results that were described by the leader, so it must be some other problem. Will he find out what other problem it is that he has only been working on for that month, because that might give some encouragement to youth and others who are very concerned with more action than that described?

Senator Roblin: Well, quite evidently the problem that I have described was not invented in the last month. It was a product of quite a long period of study—

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Roblin:—and it has been the product of a reorganization of the services to youth to try to target them more closely on training for jobs which might be available, and for placing them in jobs. Everybody knows that is not an exact science—it is very difficult to do that, but the whole emphasis of the program is now on that practical side of: "Can we fit these young people for permanent jobs and can we slot them into permanent, and, one hopes, satisfactory jobs?" It is a very tough assignment. We are working as best we can to get it moving and to have it come into effect. I have given some figures in respect of it.

What the minister had in mind when he talks about the problem I frankly do not know, but I have no objection to asking him to let me know.

ENERGY OIL PRICING

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate related to the economic situation of the oil and gas industry in Canada. The Leader of the Government knows that I have asked a number of questions about this. He has replied by saying that the government are interested and they have a watching brief. One particular meeting of great significance, namely the OPEC meeting, has taken place in Geneva. I think it has gone on over the last nine days. It was originally scheduled to be only three days, so it has been extended for a number of days in a very intense effort to find some solution. I am sure that the government was looking at that, too. Now, however, that meeting has been adjourned.

Up until the adjournment, Sheik Yamani gave some indication of his projections. It was reported that when he was asked what might happen now and what might be the prospects for some progress being made at the reconvening of that meeting—which I think is on April 16—he just looked at the ceiling and said nothing. Therefore, the oil industry is now in the situation where no one is getting any guidance as to what might happen. Oil prices are continuing to fall and, indeed, we know that the Imperial Oil Company of Canada has announced the cutting of an additional 1,800 jobs. We know that Syncrude announced in the last few days another $200 million cut in their projected renovation and expansion with the consequent reduction in the number of jobs involved.

Can the Leader of the Government now, after all these developments and all the time they have had to look at it, give us some indication of what the government's view is and what it is prepared to do to assist in the situation in that thousands of people involved in this sector are very, very, apprehensive about their jobs and their means of earning an income?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Well, my honourable friend is asking me to tell him what the future course of oil pricing is to be. I find that a hard question to answer. The last time we took a run at forecasting the price of oil we said it was going to $50 a barrel; or was it $60 a barrel?

Senator Hastings: A hundred. The Premier of Alberta said a hundred.

Senator Roblin: That was what all the wise men were saying then. The result of that old assumption was that we entered into a National Energy Policy which everybody pretty well now agrees was not the best idea. I think probably the Senate committee agreed it was not the best idea. Anyway, a lot of people were glad to see it go. Now we have the opposite problem; we are worried about how far the price will go down. Well, I don't know, but one of the writers in the Globe and Mail knows because he said:

These low prices are an aberration and will explode in the faces of those who expect them to last for the years to come.

Well, maybe that is true and maybe it isn't—I don't know. I can tell you that it would be unwise to try to base a long-term policy, or even a short-term policy, on a forecast of the price of oil in these very uncertain times. I do not think the government is going to do that. I would point out that there are reasonable expectations that we will come closer to $22.50 per barrel than we stand at the present time.

It is perfectly true that OPEC met—and it was an inconclusive round—but they did one thing, they took step one. Step one was to agree to restrict output, to limit production.

Senator Olson: Restrict production?

Senator Roblin: Yes, 14 million barrels a day was the figure that they agreed to produce, which would be a reduction from some 17 million, or whatever it is today.

They have agreed, according to reports that I have seen, that their own output should be limited in the amount that I have stated. But, as my friend says quite rightly, they did not agree how to share the cuts. That will be the next step. They are meeting in the middle of April to consider that, and we will see what happens.

I make absolutely no forecast about that. I simply observe that, according to the bulletin issued by the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, the price war has backfired and that the OPEC producers are stealing market share away from each other. OPEC, in total, has gained little world market share, but has lost close to 50 per cent of its revenue. That tells me that the game is not over yet. That tells me that we must not expect that nothing more will happen. It tells me that the odds are that something will happen and that we will find the price of oil stabilizing at a higher price than $12 or $14 a barrel, as it is today.

● (1500)

What should the government do while these events are taking place? I think it is very difficult to make the case that the government should rush in.

Senator Olson: Rush in—in three months?

Senator Roblin: I have been making this position clear all along. I think we have to wait until oil prices stabilize before we enter into issues of this sort.

Senator Hastings: OPEC sets the policy.

Senator Roblin: OPEC sets the world oil price; that is for sure, and when we get out of step with the world oil prices there are consequences which are not fully appreciated at the time we do it. I think we should be very careful before we do it again.

The government is having pretty well continuous consultations with the provinces and with the industry in order to monitor this situation. I think that is the correct course to follow at the present time.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, relying on the writer from the Globe and Mail, I have to say, with all due respect to at least one senator, that I really am not interested in what his projections may be. I am interested in what the government's view is of its responsibilities to deal with the jobs that are being lost in this industry.

[Senator Roblin.]

All the other comments the Leader of the Government has made may be interesting, but they do not deal with the question. There are thousands of people in Alberta today who have lost their jobs or who are about to lose their jobs. They are in a most anxious position as to what this government is going to do to assume its responsibility toward that sector of our economy.

The only thing I can take out of what the leader has said is that this government is prepared to do absolutely nothing except stand back and watch those jobs disappear and all the anxiety that goes along with that.

The Leader of the Government says they are not going to rush in because it is better to stand back. They have not rushed in. They have announced absolutely no policy to deal with this situation in spite of the fact that it is now close to three months since this situation began to unfold.

I really was not asking the minister, if I may be permitted to say, to look into his crystal ball, because all of us can do that. I am asking: What is the government's response to the people who are so desperately hurt in this situation and when is it going to face up to its responsibility to govern this country properly?

Senator Roblin: My friend is really advancing a proposition that the government should intervene in the market any time someone runs into trouble. There is no doubt that this is a very serious problem in the oil industry. If I were to follow his argument to its logical conclusion, the government would be a lot more interventionist in other spheres of the economy than it is now.

I say that the instability of the oil industry is such that policy cannot be sensibly developed at this time until the matter settles down and we see where these prices are going to go.

Senator Olson: So, I can report to those who have made inquiries of me that the government intends to do nothing and that their economic well-being is going to depend on OPEC, and in particular on one or two leaders in OPEC, rather than on the government that they hoped was governing Canada.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can tell his friends whatever he pleases.

Senator Olson: I want to report accurately.

Senator Roblin: We can be certain that he is going to put the most unfavourable interpretation on what I say, and there is nothing I can do to prevent him from doing that. No doubt, he will have a great deal of fun doing it.

I can tell him that the present government is consulting with the provincial governments and with the industry with a view to seeing if, when and what steps should be taken. Until we have some development of that situation, I am not concerned what my honourable friend tells his friends.

Senator Olson: The Leader of the Government has a responsibility to respond to questions in this chamber.

Senator Flynn: It all depends on whether it is a question or a comment.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn always has some comment. I am putting forward a serious question. People require some answers regarding the attitude of this government. There happens to be 21 members of Parliament, all of whom are Progressive Conservatives, from Alberta, and they have never raised their voices in the other place in response to the very serious economic difficulties that many people in Alberta are facing; so, I am doing it in this chamber.

I believe the Leader of the Government has an obligation to report or, at least, to respond to those questions so that we can have some indication of what the attitude of the government is.

I want to tell the Leader of the Government, without any reservation at all, that I take no pleasure, to use his words, in reporting unfavourably. I will report this exchange accurately. So far, however, I have not heard one indication as to what the government intends to do other than to sit back and look into its crystal ball.

Senator Roblin: It is most amusing to hear my honourable friend speak, particularly with reference to the members from Alberta, because not only was he a member from Alberta but he was a member of the cabinet when they introduced the National Energy Program which destroyed jobs and brought that economy crashing down.

Senator Olson: That is your opinion.

Senator Roblin: What protest did he ever make about that particular event when he was sitting around the cabinet table? What protest did he make when the economy of Alberta was crumbling? If he said anything, it did not reach the outer walls of this chamber. It certainly was not a protest that hit the newspaper or was known to me. Of course, I cannot say that he sat there and accepted it, because I do not know that. Reading the paper today, I see that the National Energy Program was never discussed with my honourable friend; so, perhaps, I am blaming him for something for which he is not responsible, but his government put it in place and he did not object to it after it came in; he defended it. He is not on very solid ground now when he raises this issue and points his finger at some other parliamentarians because he does not like what they did. Well, I do not like what my honourable friend did.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the most ridiculous dressing down I have ever heard because it is inaccurate. It is a ridiculous statement because there were a number of things in the NEP that I am sure we will get into later. No doubt, we will get into a discussion on Bill C-85 later today, so we will have some more to say about it then.

Senator Flynn: It is about time you entered the debate.

Senator Olson: I would like my honourable friend to understand that there are 21 members from Alberta who have not once raised their voices. I know that because I watch the debates on television and I read the Hansard from the other place, too. I can tell him, without any hesitation at all, that we would like to know where those members stand on this question.

Senator Argue: They sit.

Senator Olson: There is another point which my honourable friend seems to have failed to pick out of the newspaper, and that is, however bad this situation may have been when we went through the last depression starting some time in 1981, the predictions are that it is going to be a whole lot worse this time. In fact, it is already a lot worse. The honourable Leader of the Government has not much to stand on with respect to that statement.

Senator Flynn: Senator Olson has not, as yet, said anything that is worth noting.

Senator Olson: If Senator Flynn is talking about the Leader of the Government, he is quite right; he has not said anything yet that is worth noting.

Senator Flynn: You have said nothing.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn ought to know that the purpose of asking questions is to get information, not give it.

Senator Flynn: It is not to make speeches either.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Frith: Glass houses, stones and all that sort of thing.

Senator Olson: Isn't it wonderful how some tigers can change their stripes?

The point I want to make to the Leader of the Government, and it is for him to answer, is: He is now saying that he is not giving any indication of what the government intends to do; so, all those people who are under economic stress at the moment can expect the government to just sit back and do nothing.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend goes out to Calgary to tell them about this, I hope he reminds them of the part he played in their previous catastrophe—

Senator Hastings: Prosperity.

Senator Roblin: —namely, the National Energy Program. I hope he will take the trouble to defend what he is doing in Alberta these days, because I venture to think they will find that record pretty poor.

Senator Olson: I can tell my honourable friend that there are some aspects of the National Energy Program that are looking more and more favourable as the days unfold.

• (1510)

Senator Roblin: That is an opinion with which I find myself in complete disagreement.

Senator Olson: But the oil companies don't.

Senator Roblin: I think the oil companies were very pleased to see the end of the NEP, very pleased, indeed.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to ask a supplementary question. With great respect to the Leader of the Government, I do not think that the NEP or history bears on this question. My question is: Can the government explain or is the leader prepared to explain why refineries in Canada are selling gasoline for export to the United States as low as 19 cents per litre and are charging Canadian gas stations 26 cents per litre? These figures come from the "Oil Buyers Guide" which I take to be pretty authentic and almost the bible of the oil industry. Why should Canadian gas station operators be required to pay 26 cents per litre when Americans get the same gasoline for 19 cents per litre?

Senator Frith: It is all the fault of the NEP!

Senator Roblin: This matter has nothing to do with the NEP.

Senator Frith: Good!

Senator Roblin: It has a lot to do with the oil companies. If my honourable friend will send me the paper that he is reading from, I will see what information I can get on the matter.

Senator Argue: I shall send the paper over, and I will be looking forward to the information. The accusation is that oil refineries are charging Canadian gas station operators 26 cents per litre while the same gasoline is being sold for export at 19 cents per litre. Is it also correct that these same major companies are paying the Canadian small independent producers less for crude oil than what small independent producers are receiving in the United States? In other words, does the small producer in Canada, in fact, receive less for his crude oil than an independent small producer in the United States?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, thousands of small producers in the United States have closed down.

Senator Argue: That is not the question.

Senator Roblin: I know that it is not the question, but it bears on the issue. If my honourable friend will give me the facts that he is relying upon, I shall try to find out something about the matter.

Senator Argue: I shall certainly see that the leader gets the facts as they are quoted in the newspaper, and I will be looking forward to his reply tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: You will not get it tomorrow.

Senator Argue: I will certainly not get it after tomorrow.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In listening to the reply of the distinguished Leader of the Government, I could not help thinking of the great pilgrimage through Alberta in July 1984 when it was said that 300,000 jobs would be created, that there was a $3 billion extension to the tar sands and that a new upgrader would be built at Lloydminster. It was all pie in the sky and merely said to elect the leader of that pilgrimage, Mr. Brian Mulroney. The people of Alberta did elect him and they are now wondering where those 300,000 jobs are in light of the performance of this government.

Senator Flynn: Question!

Senator Hastings: My question is to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. IPAC, the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada, is celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary today in Calgary. It represents the small oil companies in the province of Alberta and has provided 25 years of service to the industry and to the people of Canada. The association will hear from two distinguished speakers, Mr. Dalton Camp and Mr. Hugh Segal—

[Senator Argue.]

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: On division as to both gentlemen.

Senator Hastings: —who will probably enlighten them on government policy. Has the leader nothing to offer that association at this particular time under these circumstances, except that the government is watching the prices of OPEC oil? Does he not have any plan, anything in place to give this association some hope for the future so that it may cope with the very difficult circumstances it is facing now?

Senator Roblin: I was interested to hear the reference to mega projects, as my honourable friend, when he was over here, used to entertain us, used to regale us with the list of mega projects that he had. One of these days I will look them up and see what happened to them.

Senator Doody: Where is the Lower Churchill?

Senator Hastings: They are all there.

Senator Roblin: I am not so sure that they are all there.

Senator Argue: You lost them.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend expects me to compete with Messrs. Camp and Segal, that is the wrong arena. I cannot compete with them.

Senator Hastings: So, the Leader of the Government has no message for the oil industry of Alberta, except that the government is watching the price of oil from day to day?

Senator Flynn: That is the same question over again.

Senator Hastings: It gets worse.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is about the third or fourth time I have been asked that question, and I give the same answer.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Will the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us any indication of what action the government may be taking to encourage a reduction in the price of gasoline to Canadian consumers at the pumps? What is happening there?

Senator Flynn: Which side are you on?

Senator Argue: I am not in favour of big oil companies gouging consumers.

Senator Hastings: Which side are you on?

Senator Argue: That is exactly what they are doing. A further statement in the same news article to which I referred earlier says that this gouging is handing to the big oil companies an extra $275 million a month to which they are not entitled. My simple question is: What action is the government taking to encourage a reduction in the price of gasoline at the pumps?

Senator Roblin: I shall consult with my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and find out what she is up to.

Senator Argue: You should do more than consult with her, but I will not suggest what you should do.

YOUTH

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to that concerning youth asked a few minutes ago by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I listened carefully to the exchange he had with the Leader of the Government. The government leader spoke of initiatives other than job creation, or job training initiatives that were under discussion. Indeed, the Minister of State (Youth) herself indicated not so long ago—I believe, in the House of Commons—that a new program was being developed by the government which had an element that was not particularly related to job creation.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: In a situation where there is a gap, as members of the Youth committee became aware, for a great number of young people in this country who are really in no position to enter the job market because of confusion, lack of confidence, and a whole variety of reasons, and if there is the political will to deal with the problems of these young people, and since there is already in place a structure to deal with these kinds of problems—that is, Katimavik—is the government still open to give consideration to an extension of the use of that structure—even along the lines suggested in the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth—to deal with young people who are not yet in a position to enter the job market?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, there is one thing about the report on youth that has puzzled me. There may be an answer, but I do not know it. In reading through the report, I found no reference to what the government is doing now, or, if there were any, they were rather scarce. For example, I do not believe the Department of Employment and Immigration was consulted about the programs that it has, some of which I have been trying to explain today. I do not think the Department of Indian Affairs was consulted about their programs, which are not entirely employment oriented but, most probably, are culturally oriented for a large number of young native people in the country who require our support and our assistance. This has puzzled me. If one reads through the report, one would get no idea at all that anything is being done. From my point of view, I think it would have been more helpful if there had been a balanced survey of the situation to take into account the initiatives the government has already undertaken.

My friend has asked me whether the government is willing to consider other new ideas. Yes, we are. Of course, we are. As a matter of fact, we are carefully examining the report on youth which, regardless of its defects, whatever they may be, is a valuable document. In the course of time when the implications have been suggested, I suspect the government will be making a statement as to its reactions to the proposals made therein. I certainly hope that we can find something upon which we can agree that should be done.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—GULF OF SIDRA—UNITED STATES-LIBYA CONFLICT—SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate is in a position to share some news with the Senate in relation to the hostilities that broke out in the Gulf of Sidra and, more particularly, with respect to the safety of the 1,300 Canadians who are living and working in Libya.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I can offer some comments on that very disturbing development.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs has made a plea to both parties to avoid doing anything that might exacerbate or inflame the situation. He has asked them to exercise the greatest of caution to get the issue resolved in a more peaceful way.

The Canadian ambassador in Tunis, or a representative of that embassy, is proceeding to Libya—I think that representative is there now—with a view to satisfying himself as to the welfare of the 1,500 Canadians who are working and living in that country. The information we have at the present time is that they are not in any difficulty, and certainly are not in the area of the coastline involved in recent incidents. We do not really expect there will be serious problems with respect to their comfort and safety. But we will have someone on the spot to make sure that we have the best information possible.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

SUMMIT MEETING IN QUEBEC CITY—INVITATIONS TO GALA PERFORMANCE—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to have an answer to a question I asked almost one year ago. If the Leader of the Government has provided the answer, I apologize; I must have missed it.

At that time I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Leader of the New Democratic Party had been invited to the Gala Performance in Quebec City on the occasion of the so-called Shamrock Summit. I still have not received an answer.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I take note of the fact that my honourable friend wants to know if the Leader of the New Democratic Party was invited to the Gala Performance at the Shamrock Summit held in Quebec City last year. No doubt, that information is available and I will look it up.

Senator Argue: For once he used good judgment and did not go.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have some delayed answers to questions.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

"HOW CANADIANS GOVERN THEMSELVES"—UNAVAILABILITY OF BOOKLET

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 12 last by the Honourable Senator Molgat regarding Senator Eugene Forsey's booklet "How Canadians Govern Themselves"—Unavailability of Booklet.

(The answer follows:)

When the Canadian Unity Information Office was dismantled, the Secretary of State Department continued to distribute the remaining publications, among them, the booklet by Senator Forsey "How Canadians Govern Themselves", until stocks were depleted. Since all of the CUIO materials had been distributed free of charge, budgetary restraints now prohibit such free distribution.

The minister reports, however, that the Canadian Government Publishing Centre has requested the Department of Secretary of State to have the manuscript updated, so that this very useful booklet can be republished and made available to the public again, probably during the coming fiscal year. It would be sold at a moderate price intended to recover the production costs.

ENERGY

INTERNATIONAL OIL PRICING—AGENDA ITEM AT ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 13 last by the Honourable Senator Austin regarding Energy—International Oil Pricing—Agenda Item at Economic Summit.

(The answer follows:)

The final agenda for the Tokyo Economic Summit has not yet been established, but world oil price developments will certainly be an element in the discussions.

The volatile movement of oil prices makes it very difficult at this time to estimate their effect on the energy industries of Western countries. It can be said with confidence that the overall effect of lower oil prices on Western economies will be positive though oil producers will experience serious problems during this period of uncertainty.

It may be expected that oil prices will stabilize at prices somewhat higher than those presently prevailing.

The Government of Canada has recently deregulated oil prices, after full consultations and with the agreement of the producing provinces and the industry. All concerned agreed that the free markets provide the best framework for the Canadian energy industry to operate. That view is shared by our Summit partners.

[Senator Argue.]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—PARTICIPATION OF PROVINCES—STATEMENT BY PREMIER OF ONTARIO

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on February 19 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Canada-United States Relations—Bilateral Trade Negotiations—Participation of Provinces—Statement by Premier of Ontario.

The Federal-Provincial Continuing Committee on Trade Negotiations chaired by Ambassador Reisman has met three times and a subcommittee has met once. The SSEA has been informed that this committee has made good progress on substantive concerns, that they have discussed priorities and objectives for the negotiations and have delved into a number of issues in some detail. In addition, they have begun an ambitious work program to develop a common base of facts and analysis. The work of this committee has been confidential on the agreement of all participants in order that discussions be frank and full. This is part of the ongoing federal-provincial consultative process.

When Premier Peterson made his comments last month, he suggested Ottawa should put forward specific proposals on how it will proceed in trade negotiations, that we should move from general principles to specific proposals. In doing just that, we want the benefit of full discussions with the provinces and the private sector consultative committees. Through these federal-provincial discussions, the federal government is working to develop positions which take into account provincial interest. Ontario is part of that process. If the Ontario government feels that it is time for specific proposals, one would assume that they would bring their views to the CCTN table and propose specific approaches which would be fully discussed by all provinces and federal officials.

THE BUDGET

OIL PRICING—LOSS OF REVENUE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on March 6 last by the Honourable Senator Frith regarding Oil Pricing—Loss of Revenue.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): May I have the answer read?

Senator Roblin: Certainly.

The instability of the oil market at the present time makes forecasting oil prices very difficult.

For the February 1986 Budget we assumed that international oil prices would stabilize at $22.50 U.S. for the last three quarters of 1986. The economic outlook document acknowledged the largely downward pressures on this assumption.

If energy prices turn out to be lower than assumed, such as the U.S. $13-$15 price suggested by the honourable senator, then in the very short term this would have a negative impact on the federal deficit due to lower corporate profits in the upstream oil and gas sector and lower PGRT revenues.

However, lower energy costs will provide a boost to other sectors in the economy—for example, consumption and housing would be stronger, and production costs would be lower in most industries. Overall the economy would be better off and the federal deficit would be lower over the medium term.

The negative impact on the federal deficit would therefore be temporary, lasting perhaps only one year.

IMPACT OF PROVISIONS ON FIREFIGHTING PERSONNEL AT AIRPORTS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on March 6 last by the Honourable Senator Lucier regarding Impact of Provisions on Firefighting Personnel at Airports.

Hon. Paul Lucier: May I have the answer read?

Senator Roblin: Certainly. I am nothing if not agreeable.

Crash Firefighting and Rescue Services (CFR) are provided at Transport Canada owned and operated airports, in line with established standards which approximate the International Civil Aviation Organization recommended practices and guidelines. Resource requirements—both person-years and equipment—are determined by considering the number of movements associated with the longest and widest aircraft which frequent an airport on a regularly scheduled basis, based on the past 12 months' statistics.

In accordance with the aforementioned methodology, levels of CFR services are adjusted to meet the airline industry trends. There is no intention of reducing levels of CFR protection at airports below that of the established standards.

PARLIAMENT

STANDING JOINT COMMITTEES—PROPRIETY OF COMMONS REFERRALS—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, on March 11 Senator Frith asked the Chair to look into the proper procedure to be followed when a chamber wants to refer a matter to a joint committee.

The senator mentioned two messages from the House of Commons, one of which informed the Senate that Privy Council Vote 15 was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, and the other that Parliament Vote 10 was referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Parliament. As yet, no decision has been made with respect to the two messages that were dated Thursday, February 27, 1986 and received by the Senate on Tuesday, March 4, 1986.

In the case of the first message, the reference was to an existing joint committee, namely the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. The second message, however, mentioned a joint committee that has yet to be established. As honourable senators are aware, the House of Commons asked the Senate to unite with the House to form a joint committee that would be called the Standing Joint Committee on Parliament. This proposal, which appears in a message from the House of Commons dated February 27, 1986, was received by the Senate on the same day as the other two messages. The proposal is now being considered by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

The message from the House of Commons with the proposal to set up a Standing Joint Committee on Parliament ends with a request that the Senate unite with the House "in order to give full effect" to the proposals contained in the message. However, the messages that gave rise to the question raised by Senator Frith contained no request for the consent of this chamber. The Senator drew the attention of the Chair to this omission and asked whether it was possible, correct and orderly for the House of Commons to refer something to a joint committee and simply to advise the Senate subsequently, without asking for prior consent by this chamber.

Honourable senators, it is not among my prerogatives as Speaker of this chamber to comment on a procedure followed by the other chamber. However, since a joint committee is a creation of both chambers, I feel it would be entirely in order for me to review, for the information of honourable senators, some of the basic rules that apply to joint committees.

[English]

The most obvious rule with respect to the powers of any parliamentary committee is that it has exactly the powers given to it by the house or houses that created it, no more and no less. It follows that the first place to look for the powers of a particular committee is in the resolutions of the relevant house or houses that established the committee. Only when these resolutions or other resolutions in the form of applicable rules, standing orders or orders of reference of either or both houses are not helpful does one then rely upon the principles that otherwise govern.

With regard to the powers of joint committees, it is a basic principle, as stated in May's Parliamentary Practice (20th edition), at page 732, that a joint committee —has only such authority, and can exercise only such powers, as have been conferred upon it by the two Houses concurrently, nor can the powers of a joint committee be enlarged by an order of one House alone... For a joint committee to act on an authority which had been delegated to it by one House only would be ultra vires.

● (1530)

With regard to instructions to joint committees, May, at page 733 of the same edition, comments as follows:

A mandatory instruction can be given to a joint committee only with the concurrence of both Houses. If either House gives a mandatory instruction to a select committee appointed to join with a committee of the other House, but no corresponding instruction is given by the other House to its committee, the instruction . . . is not binding on the joint committee, as a committee.

Citation 760(2) of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, (5th edition), supports May in the following terms:

"(2) A mandatory Instruction can be given to a joint committee only with the concurrence of both Houses. If either House gives a mandatory Instruction to a joint committee, but no corresponding Instruction is given by the other House, then the Instruction . . . is not binding on the joint committee, as a joint committee.

[Translation]

Another principle I would like to bring to the attention of honourable senators concerns the use of past events. Precedents are the stumbling block of parliamentary procedure. However, just because things were done in a certain way in the past does not necessarily mean that they were done in accordance with parliamentary practice, and this does not necessarily mean either that the action taken was appropriate from the procedural point of view. Before constituting a precedent, a past event must be considered in the light of the principles governing parliamentary practice.

[English]

With respect to the reference to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, I conclude from the above that unless the powers given to that committee by both houses at the time of its creation allow it to receive references from one house alone, the concurrence of this house is required in order for the reference of February 27, 1986, by the House of Commons to be binding on the committee. Having been informed by message of the reference to the committee by the House of Commons, the Senate may, if it chooses, concur in the action by adopting its own motion of reference in identical terms. It may do so, whether or not the House of Commons in its message asked the Senate to concur.

With respect to the reference to the proposed Standing Joint Committee on Parliament, the Senate will no doubt wish to wait until it has decided whether or not to concur in the establishment of that committee before deciding whether or not to join with the House in giving instructions to the committee.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

THE ESTIMATES, 1986-87—COMMONS REFERENCE OF PRIVY COUNCIL VOTE 15 TO STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE CONCURRED IN

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thank His Honour for his ruling. As a result of it, it seems appropriate to move concurrence in the first message and to leave the other standing until we decide whether we wish to concur in the establishment of the committee.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That seems reasonable.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Frith, are you putting that as a motion?

Senator Frith: My motion is that we concur in the first reference, namely, that to the Committee on Official Languages; and that we should await our decision on the establishment of the other committee before concurring in the second reference.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the second reading of Bill C-85, to amend the Petroleum Incentives Program Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to move second reading of Bill C-85, an Act to amend the Petroleum Incentives Program Act. Senators are aware that the Progressive Conservative government is committed to fundamental change in energy policy. The government believes in reliance on market forces rather than government regulation, on private initiative, on rewarding success, in treating all regions fairly, and in encouragement of both Canadian and foreign investment in our oil and gas industry.

The bill is part of a package of government initiatives that will eliminate taxation of oil and gas industry revenues, costly cash grants to the oil and gas industry, excessive government regulation of the industry, and discrimination between different categories of investments in various regions of the country.

This new energy policy reflects the government's and the industry's desire and responsibility to help establish a general framework which will encourage economic activity without making government responsible for all of the details of what are properly private sector decisions.

The Petroleum Incentives Program was part of an effort of the previous government to encourage frontier exploration. In that it was successful. But consistent with its overall commitment to an economy that relies more heavily on market forces, this government has introduced a new frontier energy policy that will, within the framework of economic logic, encourage a gradual trend toward development of frontier hydrocarbon resources. The policy includes removal of all taxes created by the National Energy Program, including the phased elimination of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax. Second, it includes the introduction and implementation of a royalty regime which is more profit sensitive.

Senator Hastings: Lots of profit!

Senator Barootes: Also, there is the introduction of a royalty investment credit and exploration tax credit to assist companies in financing their exploration activities; and new legislation to simplify and improve the management regime for Canada's energy frontiers. This is reflected in the proposed Canadian Petroleum Resources Act, Bill C-92, which is now before the other house.

When the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources reviewed the previous government's National Energy Program, it recognized that while incentives should continue to be provided by the federal government to encourage exploration and development on the frontier by Canadian companies, the Petroleum Incentives Program was no longer the correct instrument to attain that goal. That same Senate committee also called for the gradual phase-out of the PGRT. The committee was of the view that taxation of the petroleum industry should conform to general federal income taxation principles, specifically the taxation of profit and not revenue. Bill C-85 meets and conforms to these recommendations of the Senate committee study.

The government recognizes that frontier exploration is a high-risk investment. In order to bridge the gap between the termination of PIP and the development of the frontier oil and gas reserves, this government has announced a new tax-based incentive. This incentive is in the form of a 25 per cent Exploration Tax Credit which will apply to exploration expenses in excess of $5 million per well for wells drilled anywhere in Canada. To further assist non-taxpaying companies, this tax credit will be refundable at the rate of 40 per cent.

Honourable senators, you will recall that one of the promises made by the Progressive Conservative Party in its election platform, and of which we were reminded today by various senators, was the replacement of PIPs with a tax-based incentive. With this bill, which confirms the termination of PIP, and with the Exploration Tax Credit which has been introduced by the Minister of Finance, that promise has now been fulfilled.

Honourable senators, the bill before us allows for the orderly phasing-out of PIP. Just about a year ago, on March 28, 1985, the Government of Canada signed the Western Accord with the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. As part of the Western Accord, the government announced at that time that PIP would continue for one more year until March 31, 1986, and then would be terminated except for certain contractual exploration commitments written and signed and in effect at the time of the Western Accord. Those contractual commitments will continue to be honoured and will qualify for PIP payments until December 31, 1987.

Bill C-85 calls for the total elimination of PIP by the end of 1987, but authorizes a "grandfathering" regime for the period April 1, 1986, to December 31, 1987, on the frontier lands. This grandfathering regime and the principles underlying it were announced one month after the signing of the Western Accord about one year ago, in April 1985.

Extensive consultation was held with industry as to how the implementation of these grandfathering principles would affect their operations. Many made representations for changes. In fact, we are told over 100 such meetings were held. Some of the recommendations of the industry were accepted and some were not. Those that were accepted were always in the nature of a relaxation or an exception to the general rules, and not a restriction or tightening of the rules. Altogether, from the date of the announcement that PIP would be eliminated until the ultimate end of this program, it is anticipated that the cost will be some $2.5 billion. Of this amount around $1 billion will likely be spent in the grandfathering period which begins next April and ends on December 31, 1987.

Honourable senators, this is the first of several energy bills that will come before us in the weeks and months ahead. It is of this significance: to provide an orderly phasing-out of the Petroleum Incentive Program beginning at the end of this month and, second, to allow for a transition period of grandfathering payments until December 31, 1987, for those signed drilling contracts of frontier exploration in Canada, contracts that were actually committed on March 28 last year when the Western Accord was signed. This was, of course, done because of the long lead-time that actually exists with these very expensive programs of drilling.

This particular bill comes to us with the support of the major industry associations, the Canadian Petroleum Association and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada. It is also in keeping with the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources which, in parenthesis I might add, might possibly reflect on the prudence of the honourable minister and of our Senate committee.

Therefore, honourable senators, I have the honour of recommending this bill to you in the Senate.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have no wish to delay consideration of this bill by this chamber. However, I would like to reflect or remark on two or three of the observations made by Senator Barootes. May I first of all congratulate him for his very lucid explanation of the bill. I should point out that the honourable senator is one of the more valuable members of the Senate committee, and I think that fact is reflected in his presentation here today. In my opinion, Senator Barootes has given a very balanced response or explanation. I was delighted to hear him report that under the National Energy Program there was an unprecedented increase in exploration on the frontier areas of Canada. I think it is wise, just for a moment, to reflect on this policy and exactly what the purpose was of the policy at the time of its proclamation.

At that particular time, as honourable senators will recall, we had gone through two oil price shocks and all over the world there was a demand for oil. That is a considerable change from the circumstances that exist today, but nevertheless Canada was in the same position in that we had a desire and a right to know precisely and exactly what resources we had in place, or that would be available to us to face the sky-rocketing oil prices. In that light, it was a very logical, reasonable policy to put in place for two reasons: First, it precipitated exploration in the frontier areas of Canada fulfilling our desire to know exactly what resources we had to face the future. Second, and probably more important, it provided Canadianization and an opportunity for Canadians to participate in that region of Canada where they might not otherwise have been able so to do. The idea of young Canadians working on Canadian lands was a very logical objective, and if we just stop and reflect on that one point, our Canadianization under the National Energy Program rose from 21 per cent to 43 per cent, which was very exceptional progress in that regard.

Honourable senators, we created a Canadian drilling capacity on the Atlantic coast with respect to drilling and refining costs that could stand up to any drilling capacity by any multinational in the world. That was created in the maritimes by Canadians with Canadian technology, and that was a worthwhile objective that was fulfilled by the National Energy Program and in particular the program which we are laying to rest today. Therefore the PIP program did, in fact, fulfil its objectives.

Times and circumstances change; they are changing every day in this industry. Today, with prices down, there is not the need for this exploration program because we have fulfilled our quest for knowledge and we have identified certain areas of the frontier which we can now target so that the PIP program, as it was conceived, is no longer necessary, as the Senate committee found in its deliberations. Therefore, it did in fact recommend that the PIP program be replaced by a tax incentive regime that would be able to target our area, so it fulfilled its objective in that respect by identifying what we had. Now we will move on to producing it.

Senator Barootes indicated that we have now moved to a market-force energy policy. I must confess that it is going to be interesting to see if we are going to have the activity in those areas that we have had in the last few years under this market-force policy and a tax based incentive. However, as Senator Barootes has indicated, the bill in question provides for the phasing out of the Petroleum Incentives Program; a transition period to grandfather any commitments that have been made before the signing of the Western Accord—and in that respect we do not have the regulations. I can only appeal to the government to use its best efforts in honouring those commitments which have been made prior to that signing and assist in a completion of those drilling programs, especially where certain companies had an opportunity to earn an interest by drilling so many wells. They should be allowed to complete that.

As Senator Barootes correctly pointed out, this follows the recommendations of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. I respectfully submit that it is another indication of the usefulness of our committees—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator Hastings: —in putting forward that recommendation and other recommendations, incidentally, which are being followed by the government.

Finally, I should report to you, honourable senators, that, as I said a moment ago, we are living in changing times and changing circumstances with respect to energy situations throughout the world. I can tell you that your energy committee is continuing to follow these changes. Each week we have a briefing meeting. We are now undertaking a study on oil and gas marketing in Canada. The commitment I make to you is that this committee will continue to fulfil that responsibility to you in the months ahead.

I have the honour, Senator Barootes, to support your motion. I presume there will be no need for the bill to go to committee. We studied it for six months under our review of the National Energy Program. We studied it this morning and had the honour of having the parliamentary secretary and the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources present. We have reported the subject matter of the bill favourably from committee. I see no point in sending it back to the Energy Committee at this stage.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I want to participate, however briefly, in this debate because there are some problems with respect to Bill C-85 that are very real and about which I was not completely satisfied, despite the questions that I raised in the committee this morning. I want to say at the outset, honourable senators, that I, like Senator Hastings, do not intend to hold the bill up or insist that it go back to committee, and so on, but I think that Senator Barootes has a responsibility, if I may say so, to give us an explanation of what is the intention in applying certain provisions, the grandfathering provisions, with respect to PIPs that are in this bill.

I think—and I am not quite sure how to say this. I know how to say it if I wanted to be unkind, but today I am feeling fairly kindly toward everybody, but, if I was going to be particularly unkind, I would say that I got a real snow job by the parliamentary secretary when he answered the questions.

An Hon. Senator: Shame.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, just a minute. There is a complete contradiction in this bill with respect to what is stated to be Conservative policy. They have said over and over again—the minister and everyone else—that they intend to be less interventionist in the oil and gas economy and in the oil and gas rules and regulations; yet this bill widens considerably the discretionary power of the minister—particularly with respect to what it deals with, namely, setting up the provisions for phasing out PIPs.

Let me explain why. For example, clause 1 deals with the definitions. It says:

"Specified portion", in respect of an expense, means the whole amount of that expense, a lesser part of that expense or no part of that expense, as prescribed.

That is what this bill is doing.

Then, if you want to look deeper into the bill, you will find that authorization is given to the minister and her bureaucrats to set up the "specified portion" that can be paid, or the "specified portion of the eligible exploration expenses."

Really what it does is give the minister discretionary power to set, almost on a well-by-well basis or on a company by company basis—a different portion as to what will be the so-called "specified portion" that they will pay.

On page 3 of the bill, about half way down in clause 5, subclause 7, it deals with all the definitions of how you are going to arrive at the amount of eligible development expenses, and so on, and refers to 25 per cent of the "specified portion" of the eligible exploration expenses. It goes on to deal with the same thing on the next page where this "specified portion" comes up in subclause 9 of clause 5 of this bill. But it all boils back to the same thing and that is the problem. The minister is now going to have the authority, when this bill is passed, to make regulations that are really 100 per cent discretionary. It will be in the power of the minister to set what any company and any project will have insofar as the grandfathering is concerned.

I can see the deputy leader nodding his head in a way that indicates agreement with what I just said and he is right.

Senator Doody: For the record, I was agreeing to what was in this note.

Senator Olson: But it has nothing to do with the debate, I presume?

Senator Doody: No.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, that is the problem that we have with respect to this bill. We know that the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada is concerned because its numbers have expressed their concerns. We know that there is an extension of this ministerial discretion, and I reiterate that when we ask them about it they always refer to the fact that there is a limit on the financial commitments to this bill—about a billion dollars between now and the end of 1987. What that raises, of course, is the possibility that people will be treated differently. It will be a kind of first-come first-serve basis.

Senator Frith: Just check the patronage list, that's all.

Senator Olson: Well, of course! You have stated it far more clearly than I had the courage to. That is the way they will be doing it. In spite of what they said during the election campaign, they have demonstrated that they are capable of raising patronage and all the difficulties that it entails to a far higher level than has been experienced in Canada for years.

• (1600)

Senator Frith: Shocking shame; shamefully shocking.

Senator Olson: They will check the patronage list, and, if they are on it, they will get a higher "specified portion" using the minister's discretion than they would if they had come a little later when the funds would be depleted.

Senator Barootes: O ye of little faith!

Senator Olson: To mention now that we should have faith in the integrity of this government is stretching the situation as far as you can. No one believes any of them any more. I do not want to drag out all the instances of absolutely contradictory responses, because there are so many. We would, at least, like the various oil companies and Canadians generally to be treated equally under legislation that we pass through this chamber. We are now giving the government statutory authority to do certain things, including using the patronage list. I think Senator Frith is quite accurate in saying that that is what will probably happen.

There are other problems which unfold in this situation. No undertaking is given with respect to grandfathering; or that any company will be able to have the same terms and conditions apply to the end of the contractual arrangements that they have made with each other. They have made farm-in deals to test certain fields off the east coast, which is a fairly expensive proposition. That is also true of the situation in the Beaufort.

They have refused to extend grandfathering beyond January 1, 1988, and there are some deals which go beyond that date. The oil companies have already entered into these agreements covering these farm-in deals. What will a small Canadian company do if it is unable to participate at the level at which it expected to be able to participate when it signed the contractual arrangements with the landholder or major lessee? Is it going to lose what it has invested to date, because this will not be extended to the end of its contractual arrangements? Small companies are most concerned that there will be some severe losses because of the failure to perform in accordance with the farm-in arrangements that they have made.

Honourable senators, I do not want to detain you much longer. This matter has been raised a number of times. I hope that the committee—and I am certainly not speaking for the chairman—will undertake to ensure that the application of these new and wider discretionary powers of the minister is monitored in such a way that patronage does not become a problem and that we do not have interference because of first-come first-served applications being approved, since that could amount to substantial amounts of money for some of the companies involved.

Perhaps Senator Barootes, in his concluding remarks, might tell us how he explains that when a government sets out on a policy of being less interventionist, it comes to Parliament to seek statutory authority to have broader discretionary powers which lead to more intervention. That would be an interesting explanation to hear. Perhaps even Senator Murray would like to explain it.

Senator Frith: It is like putting a canary in front of a cat—not necessarily, but probably.

Senator Doody: Like a borrowing authority.

Senator Olson: It seems to me, who uses reason and logic, that there should be some consistency. If the government is going to be less interventionist in this sector of the economy, why in the name of common sense come to Parliament and ask for more discretionary power in the statutory provisions and in the amendments that are being made to the rules which are in place now?

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am a little disappointed that the sponsor of the bill did not reply to any of the questions I raised.

Senator Barootes: Manana, manana.

Senator Olson: It is requested that the bill be read the third time at the next sitting of the Senate, and I should like answers today.

Senator Doody: It is the anniversary of Greek freedom; give him a break.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE ESTIMATES, 1985-86

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ON SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (C)

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Fourteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (Supplementary Estimates (C) 1985-86), presented in the Senate on 19th March, 1986.—
(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to save some time on the appropriations bill—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: A popular cause! You should have let me finish the sentence.

Senator Doody: Frith for leader!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that several months ago some of us suggested that when estimates are referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, the committee should make a full report, since that means we can consider the report and save a certain amount of debate here in the chamber on the subject of appropriations by having the issues highlighted and the information expanded. That, in turn, can be rolled over to our advantage with respect to the appropriations bill that arrives based on those estimates.

I want to join Senator Doody in the comments he made the other day when he congratulated the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for the full report it provided to us when it accepted and studied the reference on the supplementary estimates (C).

I commend that report to honourable senators. It is found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of Wednesday, March 19, 1986.

I will touch on two or three points only, but I underline that it is worth the attention of honourable senators to see what information can be furnished by one of our committees and by a department of government to help us in considering the estimates and the appropriation bill that later reflects those estimates.

The points I want to circle can be found at page 1170 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate where the total amount provided for in the supplementary estimates is set out and broken down. On the same page, the committee made the following statement:

The Committee questioned the magnitude of these expenditures and has requested that the Treasury Board provide information comparing the costs of these two budgets with those of previous budgets. The Committee also requested a detailed accounting of the costs of the Estey Commission to date.

I take it that we will get that information, but we do not intend to hold up supply while we are awaiting it. I draw attention to the matter because the committee and its chairman, in his report in particular, pointed out the additional things that have been given to us in this report that we never had before. That is an example. That report also includes a salutary offer by the government and by the officials of the Treasury Board to reply to written questions and to furnish additional information when requested. As I understand it, they are doing this because of our request that they keep in mind, when furnishing us with information on the supplementary estimates, the eventual debate on appropriations.

Senator Leblanc also underlined certain additional information that was given with regard to write-offs and a problem that exists with reference to some accounts that can be written off and some that cannot. A perfect example of the kind of thing we requested is on page 1172 where there is an appendix to the report entitled, "Highlights of Supplementary Estimates (C)—1985-86". Honourable senators are saved the trouble of wading through all the estimates and have an opportunity to see the major items included in the supplementary estimates. In this case I refer particularly to the $875 million for statutory payments to uninsured depositors of the Canada Commercial Bank, CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and Northland Bank made under the Financial Institutions Depositors Act. Honourable senators will remember that that payment itself attracted a good deal of debate in the Senate. It now seems that if we pass these appropriations the masked depositors will be able to line up in disguise, unidentified, and collect the return on their deposits in excess of the insured amounts.

Senator Nurgitz: I will lend you my mask.

Senator Frith: If you are going to lend me a stocking, I am sorry, but I will not be in the line-up. I wish that I were.

The other highlights deal with the statutory contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Account, payments to the provinces, cash obligations under the National Housing Act, a certain decrease in the statutory payments to the Export Development Corporation because of lower than forecast loan disbursements and $90 million for something dear to the heart of Senator Argue, drought assistance to western farmers. So when we pass the appropriations bill that deals with supplementary estimates (C), that amount will be available.

Senator Doody made reference to certain additional points that might be of interest. Incidentally, I want to point out that under this same heading we have the highlights of the estimates and, as the report says, two additional points that might be of interest. It is exactly the sort of thing that we asked for earlier. There is reference to the $1 vote and an explanation and breakdown of those so that honourable senators can understand what they represent and how they are broken down. For those who are interested in such arcane matters as person-years, there is an outline as to the number of person-years included in the supplementary estimates and it is followed with details on particular votes and particular details about the supplementary estimates. Again, I commend the committee and its chairman for providing us with such detail and such well organized material on supplementary estimates (C). Therefore, we will not have to spend much time on the appropriation bill that reflects these estimates when it comes before us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, the order is considered debated.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 4, 1985-86

SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-101, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, this particular appropriation bill deals with supplementary estimates (C), which were discussed by Senator Frith just a few moments ago, and with the report which was tabled here some time ago. Bill C-101 is Appropriation Act No. 4, 1985-86 and provides supply for all the supplementary estimates (C), 1985-86. The final supplementary estimates for this year total approximately $1.6 billion and bring the total tabled estimates for 1985-86 to $107.2 billion or $106.8 billion net of loan repayments. These estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 5, 1986, and were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance on the same day. These estimates were discussed with Treasury Board officials on March 12. The total of $1.6 billion consists of an increase in statutory requirements of $1.3 billion, and some $235 million of new spending authority has been recommended to Parliament for approval.

As indicated to the committee, the proposed increase in requirements consists of the following major items which are statutory: $875 million for statutory payments to uninsured depositors, to which Senator Frith has just referred, of the Canadian Commercial Bank, the CCB Mortgage Investment Corporation and the Northland Bank; $316 million for statutory contributions to the unemployment insurance account; $215 million for statutory equalization payments to the provinces and $190 million in statutory payments to the mortgage insurance fund to meet cash obligations under the National Housing Act; $100 million decrease in statutory payments to the Export Development Corporation because of lower than forecast loan disbursements; and $157 million decrease in statutory payments to railway companies under the Western Grain Transportation Act. We have voted the following items: $92 million for drought assistance to western farmers, which is the balance of funding required for that program, and which has been included in the 1986-87 main estimates. There is $412 million because of increased costs to education, social assistance and welfare services for Indians and Inuit. There are some 40 No. 1-votes in these supplementary estimates, which are listed in detail in the report to which Senator Frith has just referred, along with explanations for honourable senators. That pretty well covers Appropriation Bill No. 4. As I said, there is probably more detail available on this bill than we have ever had before. It is to be found in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of last Wednesday.

I have two tables which I would like appended to Debates of the Senate of today.

The first is the supply to date and is broken down according to the four bills, with subtotals and totals.

The other lists the four sets of estimates broken down by votes and statutory items.

(For tables, see Appendix A, p. 2239).

Honourable senators may wish to have that information.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are dealing with second reading of the appropriation bill based on supplementary estimates (C), which were reported on by the National Finance Committee, as mentioned, earlier today. In effect, we are dealing with the principle of the bill. The principle is that we are dealing with government supply based on estimates that have been produced, examined and reported upon. I see no reason why the bill should not receive second reading now.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the orders of the day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 1, 1986-87

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the second reading of Bill C-102, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, this bill is known as the interim supply bill, or Appropriation Act No. 1, 1986-87. I should, at this time, say that it is in the standard form, and that the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, were tabled in the Senate on March 4 and were referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance for study.

This appropriation bill contains $10.169 billion of voted items which are required to meet the government's expenditure requirements to the end of June while the main estimates are being reviewed by the various committees of Parliament. A second appropriation bill will be tabled prior to June 30, 1986, to secure release of the balance of the estimates.

This bill contains a general proportion of three twelfths of all votes, plus additional proportions for some 34 votes. The additional proportions are required mainly to meet payments of a seasonal nature in some programs, in accordance with certain agreements, and the need in other instances to make major payments before the end of June. I should point out that, as usual, in no case is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of a vote.

Honourable senators, I have a table here which can also be appended. It gives a breakdown of each of the departmental interim supply requests, and will demonstrate which departments are looking for more than three twelfths and for what reasons.

(For table, see Appendix B, p. 224).

I thank honourable senators for their attention.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, which was presented on March 20, 1986.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, very briefly, the members of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments have authorized the joint chairmen, the vice-chairman and two counsel to represent Canada at the Conference of Subordinate Legislation Committees of the Parliaments of the States and Commonwealth to be held at Brisbane, Australia, June 4 to 6 of this year.

My understanding, learned from such distinguished members of our committee as Senator Godfrey, is that Australia is a leader in this field. The joint chairmen were reluctant to go, but at the urging of the members of the committee the joint chairmen will attend, if this measure is approved. My understanding is that on previous occasions when Canada has sent representatives to Australia that experience proved to be beneficial.

Honourable senators, I will only attend in the event that I am still the joint chairman when the month of June rolls around.

For the benefit of those honourable senators who are concerned about budgetary matters, the cost of this trip will come out of the budget of the Standing Joint Committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are the funds already within the budget?

Senator Nurgitz: No, the funds will be in the new budget. Because the trip will not be taken until June, the cost will be taken from the joint committee's new budget and would not constitute an extra item.

Honourable senators, I wholeheartedly endorse this report, as you can see, and ask for its adoption.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I know that what Senator Nurgitz has said about the role of the Australian joint committee is quite true. They have, for example, many powers that do not exist for our joint committee.

The problem in this case is the same as that which has arisen regarding a proposal by Senator Gigantès for approval of certain travel for a subcommittee of the Social Affairs Committee, and for Senator van Roggen, who has proposed travel expenses be covered for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. Now we have this motion. The problem is, of course, that the Rules and Orders Committee has recommended a new procedure in this regard, but that report has not been adopted. So, committee chairmen who are seeking approval by the Senate for expenditures of money do not really know where they stand, because they know a change has been recommended, and they are perfectly prepared to go under the new procedure, but the new procedure is not in place yet.

For that reason, I suggest that when we come to the order that deals with the recommendations of the Rules and Orders Committee for the new procedure that it revert to Senator Molgat. I have spoken to Senators Roblin and Doody about this as well as to Senator Argue, because it is now standing in his name, and they agree that it should revert to Senator Molgat so we will have the report of the committee, have it, perhaps, adopted and then all three of the chairmen will know what to do.

In the meantime, and because the trip is not scheduled until June, I move the adjournment of the debate on this report in the hope that when we get everything in place the three chairmen can obtain authority from the Senate under the new procedure.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators have heard the speeches made in the chamber by the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth. You have heard the exposé of the misery we saw and the stifling of growth which we found among far too many young Canadians. You have heard of the deep feelings this aroused in all of us, and you see that in the courageous action taken by Senator Hébert. In his action you see the profound dismay we felt at the insensitivity of far too many Canadians to the situation which faces our future generation. You have heard from Senator Yuzyk the nature and scope of our work, and the range of issues which we addressed. I should like, particularly, to commend Senator Yuzyk's words to you because of the courage and commitment he showed in the cause of young people through his speech in this chamber. His speech showed that what we experienced in this investigation is not a matter of partisanship, not a special interest, but an urgent matter of strategic importance to Canada's future.

Both Senator Hébert and Senator Yuzyk were dedicated to their task and brought out the best in the public hearings, the research and the writing of this report. It was an honour and a pleasure to work with them and with other members of this committee.

Senator Hébert is bringing to this issue the passion and commitment that many Canadians feel, but have not found a means to express. We do care about young people; they can be helped to find their own feet in a changing world; we are collectively responsible not only for the bread in their stomachs, but for their feelings and their mental and social development. Senator Hébert gives life to the politics of conscience, to the view that the value of each human being transcends the bureaucratic process; and I am filled with admiration for him and for his courage in standing up and being counted in a cause of this importance, and unfortunately, up until now, a cause of this obscurity.

Because of the knowledge gained through work on this committee, and the views that we expressed in our report, I was quite nonplussed by Senator Roblin's response on Thursday last to a question about Katimavik. He suggested that the government's Job Entry Program is somehow or other a substitute for Katimavik. It is not a substitute at all and I am afraid that such a suggestion reveals that Senator Roblin, like so many other Canadians, has not understood the nature of the problem facing young people and its complexity, or the instruments which are available to the government, the provinces, individuals and community groups to get Canadians back into our society. The Job Entry Program, as Senator Roblin pointed out, is directed to those who have severe disabilities of a social, educational or physical nature, and who therefore need special care and attention in order to make their way into the labour market. Such a program is important, but it is not, in any fashion, comparable to the opportunity offered by Katimavik, or intended by our recommendation for a Young Canadians' Community Service Program.

The focus of our recommendation is upon the opportunity for Canadians from 17 to 24 years of age, from all types of backgrounds and both language groups, to serve the country and gain skills which are necessary for the workplace, but are not specific to the workplace; learning how to get along with people who are strangers to you; learning how to take on a task, complete it and clean up afterwards; learning how to work with new people, to co-ordinate tasks, to fend for oneself, to be successful through one's own efforts as part of the group. All of those are skills which must be learned through experience, and it is that experience, away from the protection or the difficulties of home, with other young people, in new parts of our complex country, that Katimavik has offered. It involves work, group action, but also a sense of adventure, of self-discipline and of accomplishment. It cannot be easily achieved if one is still at home, with all of the people and the things one grew up with. How do you become an adult when the community believes that you are a child? How can you make mistakes and learn with so much at stake in the community? How can you succeed if you are placed in a work program and labelled "disabled" or "difficult to employ"?

In short, the Job Entry Program and Katimavik are quite different and serve quite different purposes. Both may be needed, but it was our strong sense that the opportunities for experience, for learning by doing, for becoming grown-up and responsible for oneself, are much more constrained for this generation than for previous generations. It is not easy to just find a job, and, if you make errors and lose it, to find another one. It is much more difficult than it used to be to travel for adventure and learning, because one cannot easily make money to finance such adventure, which used to be the rite de passage for a very large proportion of young Canadians. As a recent report of the OECD put it, becoming an adult is no longer what it was. To the three Rs, the report advocates we must add three more: role in society, responsibility and realism. Those are the kinds of qualities which emerge from participation in a program such as Katimavik.

Our report concentrated in several chapters on the means by which young Canadians might better find their footing in this difficult world, in which they are cut off from the opportunities that their parents, or even their older brothers and sisters, had. Some of those means lie in the field of employment, such as the Young Canadians' Community Service Program, and transitional experience. But others lie in education, and it is on the question of education that I would like to concentrate my comments today.

In our study we identified a breadth and depth of dissatisfaction with the education system which we had not anticipated. No one seems to like it, not the students, not the parents, not the teachers, not the school boards, not the employers of new graduates. Neither do they like the post-secondary system into which many such new graduates go. Such diffuse unhappiness suggests that the educational system, which is always a trailing institution in a period of social change, is ready for serious reform. That reform of the institution will arise at the local and provincial level, and, I would suggest, will probably be quite dramatic in its scope. It will need to prepare young Canadians for the post-industrial economy and the type of labour force and labour market which is already becoming evident in our country.

The question before our committee was: What are the means by which change and adjustment could be aided principally by the federal government? In chapter 3 of our report entitled "The Transition from School to Work" we have made nine recommendations concerning many aspects of the educational system which could usefully be changed by action on the part of the federal government or in co-operation with provincial governments. In addition, we examined a number of issues of a more general nature, such as the concerns of young women in education, which, we believe, deserve careful consideration.

Among our recommendations is one urging the government to support a national campaign to reduce illiteracy. I will not expand here on the nature of the problem, since colleagues are familiar with this issue; but I would like to point out that 7.1 per cent of 15 to 24-year olds are not literate, by Canadian measures; nor are 5.8 per cent of 22 to 24-year olds. The measure used is a rather basic one. There is virtually no work available any more for people in our society who cannot read or write. One must be able to look at a bank statement and make sense of it, to pass a driver's licence test, to read the instructions on a machine, or the warning signs in a workplace, in order to hold almost any job. There is less and less work for people with a low level of literacy. The need for good literacy skills is increasing. A larger and larger proportion of the labour force requires top literacy skills.

This is a major issue which faces our nation, and we can do something about it. We have better diagnostic procedures than we have ever had. We have learned a very great deal about tutorial work with adult learners. The need is quite clear. Frontier College and many other similar colleges, individuals and agencies are prepared to take up the challenge. But the federal government is in the best position to show leadership.

Many people who cannot read or write very well have some sort of learning disability. We learned that it is estimated that between 15 per cent and 20 per cent of people have a learning disability. That means that they may be perfectly intelligent, with all of the capacity to learn that they need, but they do not learn in the same way as other young people. They need attention and specific help.

Again, the problem is amenable to federal government action—for, like the physically disabled, the learning disabled said to us, "Don't think up any new solutions. Just implement the ones recommended in the report "Obstacles", which, as all honourable senators are aware, was published by the federal government not so long ago. We agreed with their view. We can think of no better solution than to support the "Obstacles" recommendations, and we urge the government to implement them.

Let me expand on three recommendations which require immediate action and which may not be as familiar to colleagues as the matter raised in the "Obstacles" report and in the widely publicized reports on illiteracy.

The first concerns co-ordination among jurisdictions. The usual response, when questions of federal intervention in the matter of education are raised, is the constitutional division of powers. This is a difficulty for a federal government. There is no direct mandate, no officially responsible minister and no national idea of education. However, there is a desire for a national—not a federal—policy. This was made quite clear to us by our witnesses. This is particularly true in the case of people who move often and across provincial boundaries, such as the children of military families, or parents whose companies move them frequently, or children from a province in which specialized education or training is not available.

There is a need for the harmonization of educational entry requirements across all jurisdictions, and there is a council of ministers of education, composed of all provincial education ministers and a federal presence. We have recommended that the federal government, in consultation with that body, and perhaps even by giving support to that body, establish a national task force on the co-ordination of educational qualifications. We suggest that it should be composed of the ministers of education from each province and territory, and a federal representative of equal stature—which would ease the path of students by looking at the educational qualifications and entry requirements to secondary and post-secondary institutions across the country.

I am interested to see today in the progress report put out by Multiculturalism Canada a similar kind of recommendation for evaluating non-Canadian degrees and credentials, and the licensing and practice of professions, trades and apprenticeships, which is also part of the work we would foresee being undertaken by this national task force. We would also suggest that this would necessitate some examination of the goals of the educational system, and we think that that would be equally beneficial.

● (1640)

We urge that such a national task force listen to parents and students, to employers and personnel officers, to licensed workers and to provincial union leaders and others in order to identify the problems which can be solved, and the barriers to the interprovincial movement of people and their qualifications which can be removed.

Now is the time to take this action. The government enjoys good relations with the provinces. The trade talks require that labour adjustment issues be addressed. This is not a threat to jurisdiction, but an attempt to respond to the cries for help from many Canadians who are caught in the jurisdictional squeeze.

At the same time, it would help foreign employers to understand the nature of the Canadian educational system when our young people attempt to find work, or to attend school, outside of Canada. We very much hope, therefore, that the government will take action soon on this recommendation which is both inexpensive and eminently realizable.

Co-operative Education: The second matter I would like to raise concerns co-operative education. I have already described why we believe so strongly that the Young Canadians' Community Service Program is needed. It is needed because the transition from school to work is too abrupt. The experience required to learn about work is not available in the classroom, and the classroom skills are not applicable in the workplace. In Canada apprenticeships are no longer common. However, there is a rising tide of enthusiasm for co-operative education, and our committee shares it. Co-operative education in the secondary school system serves many useful purposes, but above all it breaks down the dumping process which prevails at present. When one leaves school now, one is dumped either into a post-secondary institution or on to the labour market. All too many young people do not survive that experience, and many are frustrated and damaged by it.

In co-operative educational programs now available in Ontario high schools, students can combine school and work for a year, or sometimes more, prior to graduation. This serves many useful purposes. For the young person who only wants to leave school as fast as possible, this allows him or her to have a job, but also to stay in school and receive the education and credits which are so crucial to a future in the labour market. We heard of young people who took this route and realized after a year that they needed more schooling in order to get the type of job they wanted, and so they returned to school. For many, it prevents a complete dropping-out of school. The drop-out rates in our secondary school system are very high, and one of the symptoms of the crisis in education.

For other young people, co-operative education represents a chance to try working in an occupation that they think they want to enter, but are not sure about. For example, we heard of a young woman who thought she wanted to work with mentally handicapped people and spent a year in school in the mornings and in the afternoons at work in such a facility. She learned that she was not able to cope with work in that setting but, in the process of learning that, she did not lose her school year nor did she spend years in training for that work, only to find that she was in a line of work that she was not able to fulfil.

For yet other young people, co-operative education provides work placements which give them working access to equipment they would never encounter in the workshops or laboratories of their schools. Specialized automotive and measuring equipment for those whose occupational interests lie in those fields is important.

In addition to what co-operative education provides for the students, it provides a great deal for employers. They get a much better look at how their future workers are being prepared, what they are learning, what they are not learning, and how the educational system can help them. For teachers, it gives an insight into the labour market, the needs of employers and the changes which are occurring so rapidly on the job. For parents, the anxiety over their children's vocational choice is eased by this transitional work experience. We believe that the co-operative nature of this educational experience is of great value to all the parties within the system, and we have recommended that it be encouraged and expanded—in the schools as well as in the colleges and universities.

The Co-operative Career Work Association of Canada could serve as a co-ordinating body for provincial and national advice and exchange, and we have recommended that such a national body be supported or, if necessary, established to help co-ordinate labour laws, union regulations, exchange of information and other focused aid to co-operative educational programs.

Increasingly, one hears of successful co-operative educational systems. This weekend I talked with some people from Manitoulin Island who are very enthusiastic about their successes with this type of program for young people in that very troubled area of the economy.

Foreign Students: The third matter which can be dealt with immediately concerns foreign students. In the field of post-secondary education, the thorny issue of financing is up for review and is currently being considered in depth by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. Therefore, I would like to confine myself to our recommendations concerning foreign students.

The problems facing post-secondary institutions in inviting qualified foreign students to enter their programs are very great indeed. Not only are there differential fees for foreign students established at the provincial level, but such students and their spouses are not able to work for pay outside of the universities while they are in Canada. Increasingly, programs for Canadians which were only viable if there was a draw of some foreign students in specialized areas to make a sufficient enrolment are being threatened by the discouragement of foreign students. Areas in international relations and development, in some languages, in some areas of science and some areas of specialization in the humanities are beginning to collapse because there is not sufficient enrolment to justify programs. However, the faculty are here and are under-employed or, in some cases, working in fields in which they are not particularly specialized. There are many domestic, as well as other reasons with which you are familiar, for keeping foreign students here in Canada.

Notwithstanding these current barriers, we do have foreign students in our post-secondary institutions. These students are suffering double jeopardy in some particular ways which are amenable to solutions. For example, although they are not eligible to draw unemployment insurance and pension benefits, they are required to pay the premiums if they hold positions as teaching assistants in the universities, which is the only work they are legally allowed to do. We recommend that either they have access to the benefits, or they be exempted from paying the premiums.

In addition, foreign students must renew their visa on a regular basis to allow them to stay in the country and to work in the universities. There is now a much increased visa charge for each such renewal. For some students this can cost $200 a year or more because a student visa may only cover the period from September to May. It must then be renewed for the summer term and a temporary visa may need to be sought for the end of the summer until the fees are paid so that a new student visa can be obtained. In addition to the paper burden, the financial burden is ridiculous.

The provinces also charge differential visa fees. These fees prevent many qualified students from coming to Canadian universities. The most noticeable drop has been amongst students from the United States. Although our universities and programs of study are constantly being compared to those in the United States, we are now finding it increasingly difficult to attract American students, even though we continue to send students south of the border in large numbers for post-secondary education. For students from developing countries this problem is sometimes even more difficult because, even if they can afford the fees, they often cannot afford to go home in the summer and, of course, are not allowed to work in Canada except inside the university, which cannot afford to hire them in the summer. We are damaging our international relations and we are reducing our effectiveness in international trade and development. We are depriving Canadian students of the vital experience of studying with people from other cultures and other countries, and we are damaging our academic programs. We are being punitive to those foreign students who do make it into our system by the visa fees and social security premium requirements and the restrictive nature of the student visas and, above all, we appear to be becoming more and more chauvinistic about it. Why can we not drop the punitive visa fees? Why can we not exempt students from social security payments? Why can we not adopt a solution such as the one the United Kingdom has found to the problem of differential visa fees? Why does not the federal government, through scholarships, targeted funds or agencies such as CIDA, IDRC, and others find a way for Canada to continue to attract qualified foreign students?

● (1650)

Some of these changes can be made immediately. We hope they will be and urge all honourable senators to add their voices to our recommendations for action on these important issues.

[Senator Marsden.]

In simple terms, we urge the government in our report and we urge senators here today to support the establishment of a national task force for the co-ordination of educational qualifications; to support the expansion and co-ordination of systems of co-operative education in the secondary and post-secondary schools; and to drop the punitive measures taken against foreign students in visa fees and restrictions, social security payments and differential fees.

There is a great deal that can be done and can be done very easily and very soon. I have tried this afternoon to emphasize the immediate agenda, but the long-term agenda is also in our report.

Before I conclude let me add in response to Senator Roblin's comments on Senator Fairbairn's question this afternoon that our committee did indeed meet with officials of the Canadian Employment and Immigration Commission; we did, indeed, discuss and study the variety of government programs in the employment sector. It is because we found those programs highly inadequate in our analysis of the problem facing young people in the country that we so strongly recommended the continuation of our version of Katimavik, which we call the Young Canadians' Community Service Program. It is because there is that gap in the existing programs through CEIC—that gap in the process of experience that is entirely missed in existing youth employment programs, that we have urged the continuation of such a model.

Senator Fairbairn's question was this: "Since there is a working model which fills the gap in our programs, why not keep it until the government is in a position to design something better?" Her question remains unanswered.

The fastest action that can be taken, of course, is to retain that which is working well—in this case the retention of Katimavik. Senator Fairbairn's question stands, and I believe that our report backs up her contention.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees), presented in the Senate on 5th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Argue, P.C.)

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, we would like this to stand in the name of Senator Molgat. Senator Argue does not wish to proceed with it at this time, so could we let it stand in the name of Senator Molgat? He will be ready to proceed tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Just by way of a brief explanation, there are three items now before us that turn, to some extent, on this report for the new system dealing with orders of the Senate to permit travel and so on. That is Senator van Roggen's item, an item under the name of Senator Gigantès—at least initiated by him—and now Senator Nurgitz. We are hoping that we can get this new system established, get a report from Senator Molgat as to the response to Senator Roblin's intervention on the subject, and get the new system applying. That is why we are referring it to Senator Molgat so that he can report on the committee's reaction.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That seems to me like a sensible way to proceed, honourable senators. I think that I would be glad to accept the suggestion made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I also think that he and I might get behind the curtains some time and perhaps go over some of the points at issue. Maybe there will be a meeting of minds.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: On a point of order, honourable senators, while those distinguished gentlemen are behind the Chair, they might try to decide what happens with respect to joint committees because, as I confirmed with Senator Molgat just moments ago, his report will deal with special committees and standing committees. I do not think the question raised by Senator Frith with me a short time ago with respect to the report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is covered in those matters being considered by Senator Molgat in his Rules and Orders Committee.

Order stands in name of Senator Molgat.

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—SUBJECT MATTER OF MOTION REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marsden, seconded by the Honourable Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough):

That the Senate do urge the Government of Canada to permit freedom of assembly and speech, and such other freedoms guaranteed to all other Canadian citizens, for spouses of members of the Canadian Armed Forces and to amend or repeal all relevant regulations and orders accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, this item has stood in my name for quite some time and Senator Marsden asked me what I intended to do. I told her that I had inquired as to exactly what bylaws or regulations were at the root of her concern, or rather the concern of spouses of members of the armed forces. What I was able to find out is that it is about some provisions of the Queen's regulations that may have been in force since about the beginning of the century and which may be rather sexist, because, at that time, women in the military were not considered as they are today. I understand that the point was raised in the House of Commons and that the Associate Minister of National Defence, Mr. André, has promised to examine all these regulations and make a statement in the House of Commons. I was waiting for the statement to be made to see whether it would have been a good idea to have the Special Committee on National Defence consider the statement of the minister.

In any event, I think a committee could consider the matter if the problems have been, as I said before, identified clearly. I have no objection to that. I was going to let the matter stand until the minister made a statement, but if Senator Marsden, or someone else, wishes to do something at this time, I have no problem with that. I have made my point. I do not think we should deal with the subject matter of the motion before we have been informed as to exactly what we are talking about.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with what Senator Flynn has said. I suggest that we do refer it to the Committee on National Defence with it being understood that they are not going to deal with it, or at least that they are going to be asking the minister perhaps to appear there when he is ready to make a statement, just to get it off our order paper, because it is a matter, and here I agree with Senator Flynn, that is quite appropriate for a committee to consider—provided they get the information that he is talking about, and, of course, it will be understood when we make this reference that they cannot proceed until they do.

● (1700)

Honourable senators, I move that this matter be not now dealt with, but that it be referred to the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence for consideration.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL SYSTEM AND INSTITUTIONS

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION—MOTION TO AUTHORIZE FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE TO ADJOURN TO TORONTO, NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON, D.C. FOR PURPOSE OF STUDY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On Motion No. 3, by the Honourable Senator van Roggen:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to examine and report on Canada's participation in the international financial system and institutions and in particular the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank Group and the regional development banks, including the debt repayment problems of developing countries, be empowered to adjourn to Toronto, New York and Washington, D.C., for the purpose of such study.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, it was the hope and expectation of those of us who are members of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs that this matter would be dealt with today. Indeed, Senator Hicks and I have been deputized by the chairman to deal with the matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are again caught in the dilemma of procedure because this motion—without following the proposed procedures, but following the present procedures—asks for an authority to travel. Ideally, and for the sake of consistency, I think this motion should stand until we return after the Easter recess in the hope that we may have the report and the new system in shape. Admittedly, it will take the period of our adjournment plus another week before we can follow the proposed procedure. The committee could still say, “Oh to be in Washington now that April is there.”

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I differ with my friend, Senator Frith, greatly about this. I have spoken in this chamber before about the petty attitude we take about the expenditure of a few dollars to enable the Senate or committees of the Senate to discharge its proper functions. This is a proper function, and I do not see why, because we contemplate some changes in the rules, we refrain from acting under the rules as they are now. I think this committee should be allowed to have its request for modest travel funds—and they are modest in the extreme—to complete its work approved in such a way and in such a time, that is to say, before the Easter recess, so that the committee might make its travel arrangements to Toronto, Washington and New York for the month of May or, at the latest, early in the month of June.

As for the rather—I do not mean to be offensive, but I am going to use the term anyway—snide comment that Senator Frith made when he said, “Oh to be in Washington now that April is there,” I just do not think that is a proper comment to make about a Senate committee at all.

During my lifetime, honourable senators, I have travelled all I want to travel. I have no desire today, tomorrow or next month to go to Washington, New York, Toronto or anywhere else unless there is work to be done. In this case I believe there is work to be done. I wonder what we think of ourselves as a legislative body if we have to decide whether the Senate should carry on and perform its function on the basis of whether the Senate of Canada can afford another $10,000, $20,000, $50,000 or even $100,000 to do its job.

I very much resent the suggestion that this money is to be spent to give some people, including myself, a junket to Washington. I have no desire for a junket. I do feel that the inquiry the committee is making is important, and I do not think the Senate should stop the committee from making that inquiry on the basis of saving a few dollars or anticipating the compliance with a new set of rules and regulations which, at the present time, do not operate so far as the Senate is concerned.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think I am bound to assure Senator Hicks that I did not intend to make a snide comment. I was hoping to make a light, poetic comment in trying to suggest that we can all look forward to spring wherever we might spend April. I had no intention of offending him, suggesting that this committee was doing something improper, or was eventually not going to get its authority.

With respect, it is not a matter of saying that we think this committee should not be given the authority to travel because it is going to spend some money; it is a matter of trying to find a way for senators to know, when they vote on a motion to authorize a committee to do anything which, in turn, is going to cost money, what that amount of money will be. It is not a matter of refusing; it is a matter of not voting blind.

That is the objective of the suggested proposal, and it is certainly not a new one, because it has been around for a long time. I hope Senator Hicks will view my earlier comments in the context of their being poetic and with reference to procedure. In my respectful view, it is not a matter of being stingy.

The difficulty with saying that, in this case, we should proceed is that it leads to inconsistency in that we have suggested to Senators Nurgitz and Gigantès that they should wait until the new system is incorporated.

Having said that, I do not intend to ask that the members be called in on the matter. If the Senate really wants to give this authority now, in spite of what I have said, then why not do it?

Senator Murray: I should point out, honourable senators, that the Senate is not being asked to fly blind or to write a blank cheque for the committee. The Senate was given an undertaking by the chairman of the committee the other day that the maximum sum that would be involved in the study would be $20,000. That was the undertaking the chairman gave on the basis of his research.

I should also point out that in the almost seven years that I have been a member of the committee, one sub-committee has travelled to the Middle East in connection with our study on that matter and the committee has once journeyed to Washington when it was conducting its study of Canada-U.S. relations. The record will show that the committee is in no way and never has been profligate. We also have an undertaking from the chairman of the committee as to the maximum amount that would be involved in respect of the present proposal.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it was my impression, when this matter was discussed last Thursday, that Senator Frith had given an undertaking that we would consider the matter over the weekend and that at the next sitting the matter would be decided.

I refer honourable senators to page 2197 of the Debates of the Senate where it says:

SENATOR VAN ROGGEN: Honourable senators, I would like someone to deny me leave.

SENATOR FRITH: Honourable senators, I will be glad to accept that responsibility. I thought it was clear from the explanation I gave as to why I thought honourable senators should have the weekend to consider the matter and suggested that it should appear on the Orders of the Day for next Tuesday.

Senator Frith: It is on the Orders of the Day.

Senator Bosa: Yes, it is, but I believe the perception was that we would make the decision today and, on Thursday, it was a matter of not granting leave to deal with the subject matter. It was my understanding that since we were not abiding by the rules of the Senate, we would take the weekend to think the matter over and then the decision would be made on Tuesday.

It now seems to me that what is being suggested here is that we should postpone this decision until we return after the Easter recess or prorogation, whichever it may be. I thought Senator van Roggen had explained quite clearly that we needed to know if the Senate would grant permission for the committee to go on this delegation. I do not like the word "junket" or "trips". We are talking about a delegation that is going on a fact finding mission and about whether the Senate will grant permission so that the committee may go ahead and make the necessary arrangements to meet with senators of the United States and executives involved with international banks, people who are not very easily accessible. I thought that that was the reason why Senator van Roggen had made this special request. With that in mind, I think that the Senate should go along with the request.

• (1710)

Senator Frith: I give up.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I suggest that my honourable friend not give up quite so quickly. Things have come to a pretty pass in the Senate when I have to support the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, but I am on his side in this issue.

Senator Frith: Without even meeting behind the Chair?

Senator Roblin: I hope that that will be the solution to this problem. I am sympathetic to both points of view. After all, Senator van Roggen telephoned me to tell me what he was doing, and I explained to him the problem that I had, because I had already said in the house that I thought we should consider ways and means at the time the proposal was introduced. I have really not changed my mind. What the present argument illustrates beautifully is the problem of budgeting and how every special interest group is perfectly sure that their claim is appropriate and right. However, when you add up all the special interests and put them together, you may have a bill that may cause a problem.

I am not entirely sure that in the case of the three resolutions that we have been talking about we have a financial problem, because the amounts involved may very well be modest. However, I do not know. It seems to me that it is entirely reasonable that we investigate this matter a little further before we come to any fixed conclusion on it. It is true that the matter came up for discussion in the regular course of debate this afternoon, and that is quite proper. I do not like too many of these abridgments of the rules when the matter really needs to be discussed.

I do not know why we do not follow the suggestion that the chairman of the committee and some others of us canvass this matter. I am prepared to do so quickly to see whether we can come to some equitable solution that can be proposed tomorrow. I cannot guarantee that we would come to such an agreement, but I would be prepared to try along with others. I must say that I am on Senator Frith's side in this issue because we have budgetary problems. Perhaps this is a minor thing, but the principle is important. It is a question of management of the funds we have available, because we are not likely to get any more funds unless we raise an awful stink about it. I am prepared to go along with Senator Frith on this one, and I hope that we can come to a meeting of minds in a short time so that we might be able to decide things, probably by tomorrow.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, as a young lawyer, I once read a book by Louis Nizer, a famous lawyer in New York, who said that one should always operate on the law of probability. I suggest that Senator van Roggen could operate on the law of probability that he will eventually get permission to go on the trip. In that light, he should go ahead and make the arrangements. In the unlikely event that he does not get permission, he will have to cancel those arrangements, but I am not impressed with that argument.

Senator Argue: He may have to pay the hotel bills.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I think what Senator Godfrey has said requires a reply. Senator van Roggen has also considered this matter. He feels that since we are asking for appointments with important people with the World Bank, the International Monetary Fund and with others, we ought not to pin them down to appointments only to tell them in two or three weeks' time, "Sorry, we cannot afford to come to see you." I think that that would be infra dignitatem insofar as the Canadian Senate is concerned, and I would not want to have anything to do with it. I repeat the position that I took before, that the amounts—no, I will not repeat that the amounts are small. I do not think that that is important. The important thing is that the Senate has set itself on a path to undertake certain studies. I wonder what our American counterparts would think if we based our decision of whether or not the Senate can fulfil the duties that it has set for itself to perform upon a few thousand dollars.

Senator Frith: That is not the point.

Senator Hicks: It is the point. It has the effect of being the point anyway.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Are we finished with this matter for today?

Senator Flynn: The motion to adjourn the debate was put by Senator Frith.

The Hon. the Speaker: I understand that there is no motion on the floor.

Senator Frith: There is a motion to adjourn.

The Hon. the Speaker: I did not hear it.

Senator Frith: Did I adjourn it? No, I did not, not this time.

Senator Doody: In view of the fact that Senator Roblin has put forward a suggestion that may resolve the situation sometime tomorrow, perhaps I should take the adjournment of the debate and wait until we see what can be worked out behind the curtains, under the table, or wherever it is that you do these things.

The Hon. the Speaker: I do not think we can adjourn the debate on the motion, because the motion has not been put. It is Senator van Roggen's motion, but nobody has moved it.

Senator Hicks: Senator van Roggen, Senator Murray and I have discussed this matter, and it was agreed that we would make the motion on his behalf. In view of what has been said, I move for Senator van Roggen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to examine and report on Canada's participation in the international financial system and institutions and in particular the International Monetary Fund, the World Bank Group and the regional development banks, including the debt repayment problems of developing countries, be empowered to adjourn to Toronto, New York and Washington, D.C., for the purpose of such study.

Senator Argue: It is too late.

Senator Frith: No, it is all right.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the honourable Senator Hicks, for Senator van Roggen, seconded by the honourable Senator Murray—

Senator Roblin: We should not be debating this thing without a motion before the house!

Senator Doody: Can I not take the adjournment of this debate now?

Senator Hicks: But the motion has to be put before you can adjourn the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is being put now. Honourable senators, the motion is being—Senator Doody: Excuse me. Honourable senators, did Senator van Roggen not put the motion when he introduced it?

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Doody: Oh yes, of course not.

Senator Bosa: No, we denied him leave.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO CONSTITUTE ITSELF IMMEDIATELY IN COMMITTEE OF ORDERS AND CUSTOMS OF THE SENATE AND PRIVILEGES OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, in conformity with section 46, paragraphs (b) and (k) of the Rules of the Senate and of the motion passed by the Senate on the first day of the present session, I move, seconded by Senator Murray:

That the Senate constitute itself immediately in Committee of the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament to examine the action taken by our colleague, Senator Hébert, inasmuch as that action affects the said orders, customs and privileges of the Senate and of its members collectively or individually.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, since I moved that the question be referred to a Committee of the Whole, I don't think it would be useful to consider the substance of the matter at this time.

For the information of our colleagues, I may remind them that at the beginning of each session the Senate adopts a motion that reads as follows:

[English]

That all the senators present during this session be appointed to a committee to consider the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament and that the said committee have leave to meet in the Senate chamber when and as often as they please.

[Translation]

The committee, as I just said, is formed at the beginning of each session. And as I mention in the motion, the possibility of referring the matter to this committee is provided under section 46, because no notice is required of any motion before the referral of a question to a committee, as indicated in paragraph (b) and in paragraph (k), which mentions a question of privilege.

Once again, I do not want to discuss the substance of the question. I thought of adding to the motion that the committee would meet in camera so that it would feel more comfortable in discussing this problem, and the conclusions of the committee would then be reported to the Senate.

At this time I do not see what else we could add. We all know the problem and the fact that the Senate must come to some kind of conclusion as soon as possible. I hope that the motion as formulated will meet with the approval of honourable senators, and that it will not aggravate the general feeling on this question.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government in the Senate was so kind as to give me prior notice of Senator Flynn's intention to move this motion.

I therefore had an opportunity to consult with my colleagues, and I must say we intend to oppose this motion for the following reasons:

First, regarding the wording of the motion, we feel that Senator Hébert's gesture was and still is a personal one. He did not set out to do what he is doing as a result of some collective action by the Senate or other institutions or persons. He did so purely of his own volition.

For this reason, we do not think it is fair to see this as a problem that involves us all or as a question of privilege. This is neither logical nor defensible. We believe that Senator Hébert's gesture, as I said before, is a personal one and that it does not affect the said orders and customs of the Senate and each of its members.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I had not really thought of taking part in this discussion, because yesterday I explained at some length the position which I am adopting in this matter. However, I think there are considerations here that, perhaps, ought to be restated because they bear on the importance of the issue now before us.

I think we have to respect the right of our colleague, Senator Hébert, to, if I can quote myself, "follow his own star" and obey the promptings of his conscience in these matters. But I think there is another issue that honourable senators cannot lightly ignore. That arises from the fact that, if things go according to schedule, we will be leaving this place today for a period of several days, perhaps a week and perhaps longer. I must express my concern as to what might happen during that time if Senator Hébert should run into physical difficulties because, as things stand at the moment, there seems to be no clear authority for dealing with an emergency of that kind. As far as the rules and orders of the Senate are concerned, there is none and that really is part of our problem.

I should feel very uneasy if we were to leave this chamber today with that possibility looming in the background without having come to some meeting of minds as to how we would see this difficult problem being handled in the interval.

Regardless of our feelings on the issues concerned, it seems to me heartless to leave to Senator Hébert a responsibility which he willingly assumes—let it be said—in respect of his health and future condition, but I do not want to leave this house without having expressed concern about that and to say that we have been searching for some way of coming to grips with this problem. I do not know how Senator Hébert feels about it, but it would be a great relief to me, and to many others, if he would make some arrangements that would enable us to help him if his physical situation should deteriorate to an extent which would be seriously harmful. I do not know the answer to this problem. It may be a difficult question to solve, but I believe that we cannot ignore this aspect of the matter when we decide what to do about this motion.

● (1410)

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, yesterday we were told by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that he and his colleagues would have no enthusiasm for any collective action which would be taken against the wishes of Senator Hébert.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I did not say “and our colleagues”. I said “speaking for myself”.

Senator Murray: I thought I understood the Deputy Leader of the Opposition to say that it was the attitude of his colleagues. In any case, today he has gone one step further, and, speaking on behalf of his colleagues, he has disclaimed all responsibility, as members of the Senate, for the consequences of the action that is being taken by our colleague, Senator Hébert. Of course, it is an individual action on the part of Senator Hébert, but it does concern us (a) because he is a colleague and (b) because the manifestation is taking place in this part of the Parliament Buildings over which we have control.

The Deputy Leader of the Opposition told us a few moments ago that he and his colleagues will refuse even to discuss the matter. They oppose the motion by Senator Flynn that we resolve ourselves into the Committee on Privileges, which was established at the beginning of the session, to discuss the matter, to try to find a solution to the matter that will be a happy rather than a tragic solution.

I am disappointed and somewhat discouraged, on this last day before we return to our homes for Easter, that this should be the attitude of our friends opposite. I see no reason why they could not at least agree to go into Committee on Privileges to discuss the matter. By their refusal to do so, they are disclaiming any responsibility for what happens. It seems to me to be an attitude that is laden with very grave consequences.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, just so that we can be clear, perhaps Senator Murray was not present in the chamber when I explained the position. I did not make this particular point, but I must say that I do not understand why the question of privilege is any different on this Wednesday from what it was on Tuesday, or at any other time, with regard to this motion, which is whether my privileges or those of other honourable senators are being affected by this action.

Senator Hébert is here. We know that he has taken this action. I personally support the action he has taken, and I support his cause.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: But that is not the point here. The point is that we are being asked collectively to try to find a solution to a problem arising from an action taken by one of our colleagues. I am sure that our colleague took that action knowing what the results would be so far as his health is concerned. Our position is—and I believe it is very relevant to the motion before us—that it is not action taken by us and that it is not affecting our privileges collectively or otherwise, and beyond that it is not our business as a Senate.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to add my personal regrets to those of Senator Murray concerning the attitude of the official opposition. In fact, their overwhelming majority makes them masters of the Senate and its positions.

In proposing the motion I refrained from dealing with the basic issue. I have no intention of saying anything more, other than rejecting the suggestion of Senator Frith to the effect that the privileges of all senators, individually or as a whole, are not affected by the behaviour of Senator Hébert.

Since Senator Frith has raised the question, I admit that Senator Hébert has every right to be on a hunger strike and threaten his own health. He has the right to resort to means which are more or less consistent with ethics, and certainly contrary to parliamentary procedure. But he does not have the right, for personal purposes, to occupy the premises as he has been doing for 15 days.

Needless for me to describe what the situation might be if five, ten or more members of this house were to decide to emulate him. We know full well no-one is allowed to occupy these premises day and night. We know full well that most senators would not let someone from the opposition behave as Senator Hébert is doing by occupying the premises. The hunger strike is his business. Occupying the premises, contrary to Senate customs, is a problem which may become very serious over time. In any event, the Senate will have to solve it eventually. I would much prefer that it be settled now, before Senator Hébert endangers his health. Senator Roblin mentioned that we are going to be absent—

Senator Frith: On a point of order, honourable senators, as I understand our rules, Senator Flynn is now exercising his right to respond. He does not have the right to launch into another speech—that is what he is doing—in which he raises other questions to which we will have an opportunity to respond, and so on.

In my opinion, he is abusing his right to respond and close the debate.

Senator Flynn: I thrive on applause from onlookers, like Senator Sinclair's, for instance, who does not understand anything about the Rules of the Senate; this is not the Canadian Pacific boardroom!

[English]

Senator Frith: Come on, Jacques!

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Who raised the question?

[English]

Senator Frith: You are really abusing the proceedings. Order!

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Who raised the question?

[English]

Senator Frith: It is not a reply. It is a new speech.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Who raised this question? Listen, did Senator Frith say—

● (1420)

[English]

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn merely has the right of reply. This is an abuse of privilege, but of course he will go on and do it.

Senator Sinclair: Perhaps he would get up and explain the rules.

Senator Flynn: If I thought it would be useful, I would do so, but I am replying to the objection by Senator Frith. In my comments I was very careful to say that I do not want to touch upon the problem of the action of Senator Hébert as such. I said, let us examine whether the privileges and the customs of the Senate are involved here.

Senator Frith: You made that speech when you started.

Senator Flynn: You replied, "No."

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: In closing the debate, I have the right to contest your argument, and the only way—

Senator Frith: Yes, but not with new material.

Senator Flynn: It is not new material. You said that it does not affect our privileges. I am explaining how it affects our privileges.

Senator Frith: You are going to do it anyway, so go ahead.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Flynn: You should have understood that. You were merely trying to stop me, and you know that you will have no more success than you have had up to this point, because it is only obstruction that you have in mind.

Senator Stanbury: You do not care about the rules.

Senator Flynn: The rules are quite clear. I could have touched on that question in my main presentation. I would not touch on it in my reply if Senator Frith had not claimed that the action of Senator Hébert was not affecting the rights and privileges of the Senate or of senators individually. I was merely making that point and warning the Senate, and the Liberal majority which controls the Senate, that eventually the problem will come back to haunt us. I was merely asking that we discuss it and I was willing to discuss it in camera in order to avoid the problem of controversy and partisanship. I did not touch on the question of conduct up to that point; you did, and you would wish me not to reply to you. In other words, to let the record stand as if you were entirely right. You have the right to win because of your numbers, but you do not have the right to be always right.

Therefore, I suggest to you, honourable senators, that we are missing an opportunity to deal with this matter in a civilized way. It is the responsibility of the Senate to say no to this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, pursuant to rule 46(b) and (k) of the rules of the Senate, and with the motion passed by the Senate on the first day of the present session:

That the Senate constitute itself immediately in Committee of the Orders and Customs of the Senate and Privileges of Parliament to examine the action taken by our colleague Senator Hébert, inasmuch as that action affects the said orders, customs and privileges of the Senate and of its members collectively or individually.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators in favour of the motion please say "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker: In my opinion, the "nays" have it. And two honourable senators having risen.

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps we can dispense with the continuation of the ringing of the bells and have a standing vote immediately.

Senator Flynn: We have no problem with that.

Motion negatived on the following division:

SENATOR HÉBERT—HUNGER STRIKE—SPEAKER'S STATEMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, I had prepared a statement, and I am pleased to advise you on matters as they now stand from the point of view of the Chair.

As the situation developed, it became clear that action would have to be taken by the Senate, and I have, accordingly, acted in three areas of concern. These three areas are security, legal and medical.

● (1430)

I turn first to the question of security. In this area I have two concerns. The first is the protection of Senator Hébert from any unacceptable harassment. The second is to see that the precincts of the Senate are adequately protected.

I have instructed the Clerk to take whatever action is necessary to ensure that these two goals are met. I have also satisfied myself that he has taken the necessary steps with his officials.

I think that all senators will agree that to date there has been no adverse incident in the area of security and that our protective staff are to be commended for the manner in which they have carried out their duties.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: With respect to the legal aspects of this unprecedented situation, my concern is of course to ensure that a correct balance is struck between the legal rights of all concerned, including Senator Hébert, other senators, the Senate, the press and the public. The legal aspects of the matter have been referred both to our Law Clerk and to outside counsel for their comments. The reports of these gentlemen are providing me on an ongoing basis with the necessary perspectives on the parliamentary and civil law aspects of the situation to ensure that, as the Senate acts and reacts to the facts, it does so in a way consistent with the traditions of Parliament, the law and common sense.

My third area of concern, the health of our colleague, is one that has also been the subject of an expression of concern by many senators, especially those of the medical profession. Honourable senators are no doubt aware that, almost from the first day of his fast, Senator Hébert has been attended on a daily basis by his personal physician. Notwithstanding this fact, it seemed wise to me to ensure that the senator and the physician in question have the benefit of a second opinion. With these goals in mind, I asked Senator Hébert to accept to have a second medical consultant, appointed by the Department of National Health and Welfare. Needless to say, the senator was co-operative and his physician will be regularly in touch with the medical consultant.

[English]

A parliamentary recess is now upon us and honourable senators will want to know what arrangements have been made to ensure that the development of this situation is properly monitored in our absence. My decision is to appoint a committee of three persons, all officers of the Senate, to keep me informed of the situation at all times. These persons will have access to me on a twenty-four hour basis.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I trust that my actions and plans meet with your approval and I invite any comments that honourable senators may have. Finally, I think that I express the wishes of all honourable senators, even Senator Hébert, when I say that I hope that this matter will soon be resolved.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Well, honourable senators, in responding to His Honour's statement, I suggest we ought to make it clear that while thanking the Speaker for the natural concern he has in his position and for the subjects he delineated in that statement, we should remember—and I am sure we all do remember—that there is no difference between any of us on the fact that the privileges of a senator are the subject matter of and within the responsibility of the Senate as a whole.

Senator Argue: Exactly.

Senator Frith: Therefore, if Senator Hébert has agreed to the steps that have been taken—those that affect him directly, such as those relating to his health—then it seems to me that we should support those steps, because in doing so we are supporting his privileges.

I hope that Your Honour intends to maintain the principle that any steps that are taken, especially any steps that are taken against the wishes of Senator Hébert, must be the subject of consideration by the Senate as a whole.

Senator Flynn: What about in our absence?

Senator Frith: We can be called back, of course, under the rules.

Senator Murray: Put that on the record.

Senator Frith: It is on the record.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT AND RELATED ACTS

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Italian benefits and (d) what is the total amount of funds remitted to that country?

Reply from the Minister of National Health and Welfare:

A Reciprocal Social Security Agreement between Canada and Italy was signed on November 17, 1977. This Agreement, which took effect on January 1, 1979, enables the two countries to coordinate their social security programs that provide old age, disability, survivors and death benefits.

The Agreement makes it possible to add periods of residence, insurance, or contributions in the two countries in order to meet the minimum eligibility requirements of the social security scheme of either country.

The agreement prevents a worker from having to contribute to the social security schemes of the two countries for the same work.

Each country pays its benefits inside its own borders or abroad, if the minimum conditions for the payment of benefits abroad have been met and if such payment is provided for under the Agreement or by the country's legislation. The amount of the benefit aid is proportional to periods of residence, insurance or contributions to the Canadian or Italian schemes, as applicable. Each country pays its benefits in its own currency directly to the beneficiary.

PETROLEUM INCENTIVES PROGRAM ACT

BILL TO AMEND—THIRD READING

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes moved the third reading of Bill C-85, to amend the Petroleum Incentives Program Act.

He said: Honourable senators, if any other honourable senator wishes to speak, I shall defer.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, this is a very strange procedure.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Barootes has moved third reading.

Senator Olson: I understand that and I have no problem with it. My concern is that Senator Barootes, the sponsor of the bill, did not reply to any of the questions we raised when we closed the debate on second reading.

Senator Doody: Senator Barootes is prepared to answer any of your questions.

Senator Olson: Now he chooses, apparently, not to make any comments on third reading.

Senator Doody: He thought you might have another question.

Senator Olson: I am sorry; I misunderstood him.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, my purpose was to defer my answers to the questions raised yesterday because someone else might wish to have the floor, and I would yield to him first.

There apparently being no one else who wishes to speak, honourable senators, perhaps I can proceed to deal with the evocative statements made by my dear friend yesterday.

In my closing remarks on Bill C-85, I should like to thank Senator Hastings and Senator Olson for their contributions to our discussion. Senator Hastings, as chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, indicated that he can support the bill. Essentially it conforms to the recommendations of his committee's study of the National Energy Program.

I also concur in his opinion that the Petroleum Incentives Program, in its early existence, helped to delineate the existence of what are termed "elephants" or large pools of light oil in the frontier areas at a time when our reserves of light conventional oil in readily accessible areas were diminishing. This was, indeed, accomplished, however, at a very heavy cost to the purse of the government and the Canadian taxpayer.

The days of such high-risk wildcatting are over. We now require development to bring such reserves to production and to market; hence, as he said, PIP is less required now in the national interest.

I also agree with the honourable senator that it did assist many small Canadian companies to gain experience in conjunction with larger companies with more expertise in this field and, indeed, may have helped—again at a very high price—our Canadianization policy.

Yesterday, during debate on second reading, my honourable colleague, Senator Olson, questioned the use and the extent of the minister's discretionary powers as set out in the bill. The honourable senator was concerned that the exercise of ministerial discretion on a well-by-well or company-by-company basis would leave some Canadian companies without PIP incentives due to budgetary constraints.

First, let me say that the budget for PIP grandfathering, which is estimated to be around $1 billion from April 1 on, was arrived at in consultation with the oil and gas industry. The industry was canvassed and the matter was discussed with them as to the wells they wanted to drill, based on prospectivity and marketing economics. These wells are all commitment validating wells as of March 28, 1985. No new commitments after that date will be eligible for PIP under the grandfathering régime.

Therefore, it is most unlikely that the cost of this grandfathering régime will escalate; rather, honourable senators, given the present world oil situation, some companies may not be able to complete all their planned activities thereby freeing up some of the dollars in this budget.

Second, allow me to assure Senator Olson and my honourable colleagues here in this chamber that this bill does not confer upon the minister broad discretionary powers; rather, the minister will be constrained by regulations which will set out which applicants and which activities will be entitled to PIP.

In particular, I would point out to Senator Olson that the specified portion referred to in clauses 1 and 3 of the bill will be defined in regulations to mean that a person who, on March 28, 1985, was an exploration agreement interest holder or was a party to a signed unconditional agreement which provided for the applicant's participation in the drilling of a well will have his qualified share of well expenses provided as a specified portion.

Since the well itself must meet the initial test of being a grandfathered well, that is, a prescribed activity, the specified portion provisions can only limit who can be qualified for PIP. For example, if a company were committed to picking up 30 per cent of the well cost on March 28 of last year, the date of the Western Accord, but subsequently agreed to pick up a larger portion of the well, say, 50 per cent of the cost, the expenses incurred as a result of the increased commitment since the date of the Western Accord, that is, the additional 20 per cent, would not automatically qualify for grandfathering and, therefore, not be a specified portion.

If there were unusual circumstances, the minister, in her discretion, might recommend regulatory amendments to pick up this additional 20 per cent, and this is the flexibility which the industry requested—yea, demanded—to be included in the bill to allow for changes in these kinds of circumstances.

Clause 4 of the bill empowers the minister, in granting an approval for grandfathering, to provide relieving discretion in situations. She would previously have been faced with an all-or-nothing situation.

Honourable senators would be aware that the Canadian Petroleum Association, in testimony before the legislative committee on Bill C-85, specifically endorsed the entrenchment of ministerial discretion in the bill so as to allow the minister this flexibility to judge the merits of special circumstances which arise from time to time, given the complexity of the industry's operations.

Honourable senators, as I stated in my remarks yesterday, the industry is well aware of the principles underlying the grandfathering regime. Indeed, over 100 meetings were held with the industry on how to implement these principles and to explain how they would affect individual companies. The minister, in listening to the industry, directed that the regulations contain provisions to allow for both generic and specific company exceptions.

Let me provide honourable senators with a couple of examples. PIP will be provided for an additional 30 days past March 31, 1986, to companies drilling in the Northwest Territories or in the ice islands of the Arctic so that they can complete their drilling season. Similarly, there will be an extension because of ice floes down in the Hibernia area. It is also a matter of public record that the minister has made a special exception for Husky-Bow Valley and the Home-Esso group to receive PIPs on penalty expenses during the grandfathering regime.

As the parliamentary secretary observed during the meeting of the committee yesterday, the regulations are yet to be released. They have been drafted and are currently being finalized by the Department of Justice. However, let me again reiterate that the principles underlying those regulations have been known to the industry for some time. The regulations in no way detract from the principles generally outlined. In fact, the regulations will provide for specific exceptions. It is my belief that those regulations should go a long way toward satisfying the concerns mentioned by Senator Olson yesterday.

He also commented on extending the period of PIP beyond 1987, since drilling programs on frontier properties may be projected for several years in advance of actual work.

The notice given to the industry of the government's intention to end PIP, with which it agreed, was given in April, 1985, giving a lead time of two years and eight months—which I believe is amply generous and fair to any economic plans. Certainly it is a much longer period than the precipitate changes in oil prices which were experienced in 1973, 1979 and again this past winter. Moreover, the request to extend PIP, as suggested by Senator Olson, seems to misinterpret the very intention of the bill. Bill C-85 is meant to end PIP, not to perpetuate it.

Finally, honourable senators, the government was accused of espousing less interventionism in the oil and gas industry when, in fact, Senator Olson believes that ministerial discretion in this bill actually means that the government is more interventionist. In fact, the act will allow for more flexibility in this anxious transition period—a quality which the industry has sought of the minister, and a quality which she has amply demonstrated in her consultations in the past 18 months.

Honourable senators, I should be more than willing to allow the oil industry, the provincial governments and the public to decide if Pat Carney has demonstrated characteristics of interventionism rather than consultative co-operation. In that regard, I would be very pleased to have her attitude compared to that of her predecessor, the Honourable Marc Lalonde. Honourable senators, I move third reading of this bill.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I wish to express my appreciation to Senator Barootes, the sponsor of this bill, for trying to deal with some of my questions.

Senator Doody: You are forthcoming.

Senator Olson: I am glad that is the opinion of the Deputy Leader of the Government. But I have to say to Senator Barootes that while I admire his attempt, I do not admire some of his examples. There is always reference to something that may have happened in 1980 or 1981. I might say that a long discussion would be necessary to make that comparison valid, and I do not intend to take that much time this afternoon. There is one thing that should be said, which is that the government, including Senator Barootes and his colleagues, should understand that Canadians are getting tired of that explanation. That is no longer a good explanation. It was good for a few months. What Canadians are interested in is not what happened way back behind us, whether it is two years, five years or twenty years. What they are interested in is what the government is going to do now and what is the policy basis on which it is going to do it.

I wish to say also that I believe that Senator Barootes did not tell us satisfactorily what the minister is going to do with that wider discretion that she has under the statutes. There are two areas. He said, "Well, we are going to make regulations under the statutory authority given in Bill C-85 that will do certain things." When we in this chamber are considering amendments to the statutes, to the whole legislative process, we have to look at what the authority that is given will do—and that includes the parameters in which they make regulations. So far, there has been no description of what the government intends to do with respect to those regulations, except that it says, "Trust us. It will be all right." Well, if I were a small oil company which had entered into contractual arrangements that made it mandatory that I live up to those contractual arrangements with some other company, where in some cases 80 per cent of the cost was going to be paid by the Petroleum Incentives Program, I would be very worried about the minister's having the discretion concerning whether or not there were going to be rules that applied uniformly across the country.

As a matter of fact, Senator Barootes has again admitted that there is a limit of $1 billion until January 1, 1988. I have been told that it does not provide sufficient money for all of the "farm-in" deals and the plans that were based on them. Senator Barootes did not deal with that point. It is very important that we know whether or not there are "farm-in" contracts. For those honourable senators who are not familiar with the jargon of the industry, when I refer to "farm-in" I am referring to arrangements that are made by a number of oil companies with the major leaseholder to do some of the development on that leasehold. Senator Barootes did not answer whether or not the government had even considered the matter, to see whether the amount of money over the period of time was sufficient to satisfy all of the contracted arrangements that had been made. What happens to a small oil company that had a "farm-in" arrangement with, for example, Imperial Oil? Does it lose its interest and all of the value of its investment to date because it cannot live up to the rest of it—because the cost of doing that kind of development changes rather dramatically when you have to pay 100 per cent rather than 20 per cent of the cost of the exploration and development?

As I said, I do not intend to be too long on this debate. However, I am rather disappointed that the honourable senator could not be more specific in his answers.

• (1500)

In conclusion, I believe that we are slipping again. I believe that the consequences of phasing out the petroleum incentive grants will leave the entire field of exploration and development on the offshore on the east coast, whether it is Hibernia, farther north on the Labrador coast or south near Nova Scotia, to the multinationals, because virtually none of the Canadian companies is large enough to handle that kind of activity without some help to at least delineate the seismographic findings. These operations are being left entirely in the hands of multinational companies such as Exxon, Shell, Texaco, Chevron, and so on. I do not think that it is good for Canada to be heading back to the situation where, for example, 85 per cent of all oil production in Alberta was in the hands of the multinationals. It is sad, because we had made quite a lot of progress, as Senator Barootes just admitted, in Canadianization, in Canadians owning a larger portion of this vital resource. Obviously, this will slip away again. It is unfortunate.

I had intended to say a few words about some of the other matters, such as the fact that the industry is well aware of the discretionary powers being given to the minister under this bill. However, I asked myself, "So what?" Did all the little companies agree? Did they take out their contractual arrangements, and so on, and say, "Well, are you going to honour your part until the end of these arrangements?" Senator Barootes did not say as much. He said that the program will end at the end of 1987. Senator Barootes pointed out certain provisions. As a matter of fact, he used the example to show where the minister could change the amount to be paid out by some 20 per cent. I suspect that there will be a lot of these changes for a number of reasons. The senator did not explain very well how they would word the regulations with respect to that matter. In effect, the government is saying, "Give us all this statutory authority to make regulations and trust us." I do not think that there are many oil companies that have important investments and that are now at the stage where a wrong move could break them who would like to say, "We trust you to act completely and fairly for everybody involved."

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed, on division.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 4, 1985-86

THIRD READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government) moved the third reading of Bill C-101, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1986.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

APPROPRIATION BILL No. 1, 1986-87

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall, for the second reading of the Bill C-102, intituled: "An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1987".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as was pointed out by Senator Doody yesterday, this is Appropriation Bill No. 1, 1986-87. Its purpose is interim supply. The government is not being given supply for the fiscal year 1986-87. It is being given a portion of the supply that it needs to function in the meantime. As Senator Doody also pointed out, in no way is Parliament being asked to pass the entire amount of the vote. This means that in the usual way and according to Parliamentary tradition, the Senate is not to be taken as passing on these estimates or in any way giving up its right to raise questions on the estimates that relate to the interim supply or a fraction of the supply.

Senator Doody: Agreed.

Senator Frith: For that reason, I see no reason to debate this matter further and suggest that we give it second and third reading today.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a few remarks to make on this appropriation bill. Good health care for Canadians, I believe, should be the right of all Canadians. It seems to me that our medical and health care systems are at something of a crossroads. Growing knowledge and advances in many aspects of treating acute and chronic disease seem to be at hand. On the one hand, health practices that can add to human well-being, happiness and longevity are considered, discussed and sometimes recommended by health practitioners. On the other hand, the often near total dependence on drugs and surgery by many in the medical profession is being questioned and challenged by laypersons and by growing numbers of the medical profession itself, certainly by those practitioners whose emphasis is outside the realm of drugs and surgery.

Larger and larger numbers of our population are reading widely on the practice and claimed successes of such diverse and wide ranging regimes as homeopathy, osteopathy, reflexology, holistic medicine, acupuncture, allergy treatment, naturopathy, chiropractic, health foods, diet, exercise, meditation, herbs, massage, faith healing and psychic healing.

Advances in traditional medicine—that is, in controlling disease—have greatly reduced the incidence of death from contagious diseases. Instead, the disabilities that now add greatly to costs and fill the hospitals are the chronic and degenerative diseases, such as mental illness, cancer, strokes, cardiovascular diseases, arthritis, cirrhosis, allergies, chronic bronchitis, and emphysema as well as injuries at work, at home and at play. The extent of degeneration and chronic diseases may require different approaches to treatment, cure and prevention.

Therefore, the question arises: How can we deal most effectively with these chronic afflictions? How can we provide a wide range of health services that result in healthier, happier people? How can we provide such services at reasonable and, if possible, reduced costs? What are the rights and responsibilities of the citizenry? Should the public be entitled to freedom of choice of a wide range of health care and treatment services, or should we continue on the present course where the available treatments are solely, or almost solely, concentrated in the current exclusive and restrictive services provided by conforming members of the medical profession; a profession whose parameters of practice are defined, restricted and disciplined by members of the provincial or territorial College of Physicians and Surgeons or Medical Council?

Is this a system that constitutes an unjustified monopoly and denies to the public the chance to use other disciplines that may show superior results and greater patient satisfaction? Further, what is the potential of preventive medicine? Can increased emphasis on preventive medicine promise improved health care at lower costs?

As the public gains more and more knowledge of various types of health care and their potential, and as more and more persons offer health services outside the current narrow medical practice dependent on drugs, surgery and hospitalization, the reaction of the medical associations is to oppose these developments and, where medical doctors are involved, to move in on them and to suspend their licences.

A number of medical doctors have come to me with reports of harassment and perceived unjustified action by their respective medical associations. A case in point is that of Dr. Donald Branigan, a medical practitioner in the Yukon. He has been accused by his fellow practitioners in the Yukon Medical Council. Dr. Branigan has the largest medical practice in the Yukon. His treatments often consist of dietary change, the use of vitamins, acupuncture and stress-relieving procedures. He was first brought before a board of the Yukon Medical Council. His licence was suspended. During this time, he ran for re-election as Mayor of Whitehorse. In spite of a strong campaign against him, he was re-elected mayor with a very large majority. A petition in support of Dr. Branigan obtained more than three thousand signatures. On an appeal to the courts, a judge ruled that the committee of the Yukon Medical Council had a conflict of interest and should not hear the case. The newly selected review board consisted of members of the Alberta medical profession. Dr. Branigan's licence was reinstated after the judge's decision, but it was subsequently suspended again by the Alberta committee. Dr. Branigan has been presumed guilty before a final decision has been rendered. He has been deprived of his livelihood. His legal expenses to date are in excess of $30,000. He is without legal counsel because he requires a deposit for future legal expenses of $25,000, and he does not have the money.

In Whitehorse and the rest of the Yukon, Dr. Branigan is the people's choice. However, his type of practice appears to be a threat to the conventional, narrow, drug/surgery/hospitalization regime of his medical competitors.

Speaking to this matter on a personal basis, Dr. Branigan considered the symptoms of my youngest daughter, Dawn Murphy. My daughter had been ailing for 15 years and her condition seemed to worsen in spite of treatments by many doctors in Ontario and Saskatchewan over this period. Dr. Branigan discussed my daughter's condition with my wife, Jean, who is widely read on health matters, and handed my wife a good deal of literature on allergies and immune deficiencies and recommended a particular textbook for study. Our daughter sought medical treatment along the lines suggested by Dr. Branigan, and after eight months of these new treatments, having to do mainly with diet, she is today in good health. She is able once again to look after her family and has accepted a full-time job.

Some other aspects with regard to this inquiry are: There was a wide seizure of Dr. Branigan's medical records. These records, in my opinion, should not have been seized and their seizure should not be condoned. Such seizure, in my judgment, is contrary to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This inquiry is in secret and that, I believe, is unfair. No trial should be conducted in secret. This inquiry and others like it should be open to public scrutiny.

There is widespread support for Dr. Branigan, both by his large number of patients and by the Yukon public. I believe that citizens should have freedom of choice of medical and health practitioners.

There are health services that are not dependent on drugs, surgery and hospitalization that have helped many Canadians. Such services are gaining greater support and acceptability. The types of services provided by Dr. Branigan and by many other health practitioners in other parts of Canada should be available to all Canadians. Under the circumstances, I hope that Dr. Branigan's records and licence will be restored with no undue delay.

Health care and costs are of enormous importance. In the days ahead, I will ask the Senate to give consideration to the establishing of a special committee to study the whole question of a broad spectrum of medical and health services and how their availability, delivery and effectiveness can best serve the health needs of Canadians.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ARMY BENEVOLENT FUND ACT AND RELATED ACTS

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-100, to amend the Army Benevolent Fund Act, the Children of War Dead (Education Assistance) Act, the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the Pension Act, the Veterans' Land Act and the War Veterans Allowance Act.

● (1520)

He said: Honourable senators, once again I am pleased to introduce legislation to upgrade programs benefiting a large number of veterans and their families.

Honourable senators, the government of the day has been completely faithful to its election promises to veterans. This bill is the second major piece of legislation brought forward since the Honourable George Hees was named Minister of Veterans Affairs. The first series of amendments cured many of the deficiencies that the Senate pinpointed in its report: "They Served, We Care". The bill before the Senate today continues in that tradition.

Honourable senators will recall that the first pieces of legislation dealt with two amendments introduced by this government. The first amendment enshrined the basic right to a pension; the second extended the proportion of pensions for widows so that they now receive the married rate for a disability pension for one year after the death of the spouse. That allows them time to adjust to their new circumstances.

Former prisoners of war will particularly welcome this legislation. Those Canadians taken prisoner at Hong Kong in 1941 will be the main beneficiaries of the amendment eliminating the long-entrenched "100 per cent" rule covering veterans' compensation.

Let me explain the background, honourable senators. As most of you are aware, a disability pension is based on the degree of disability sustained by a veteran and the severity is translated into percentage terms with 100 per cent representing total disability. In addition, former prisoners of war are entitled to compensation because of their confinement. This is expressed as a percentage of the disability pension benefit. Hong Kong prisoners of war received compensation equal to 50 per cent disability. Naturally, honourable senators, the vast majority of these particular POWs have a double claim to compensation. But under section 8 of the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, they could not go beyond 100 per cent. That section limited their overall compensation to 100 per cent of the pension rate.

To his great credit, Mr. Hees has said that this is unjust. He believes both awards should count to the maximum, and that there should be no convenient, arbitrary cut-off level. I am confident honourable senators will agree with the minister.

In other words, if a disability pensioner were now receiving 100 per cent, and he happened to be a Hong Kong veteran who was incarcerated, he was entitled to a 50 per cent POW compensation, but did not receive that. Under this bill he will now be able to receive both. Before he could not go beyond the 100 per cent limit. That veteran would have received $1,191.00 as a 100 per cent disability pensioner at the single rate. Now his pension will increase to $1,786.00, which means that he will, indeed, be getting 150 per cent disability pension, a change which was never contemplated before. Other veterans will receive a lesser increase, depending upon the severity of the disability. They all deserve everything Canada is able to offer them, because they have lived through the most terrible of wars.

The lesser disability is for a veteran who is receiving a 90 per cent disability pension, and being a Hong Kong veteran, and having been incarcerated, he was entitled to 50 per cent. He will now receive 140 per cent, with graduations of 10 per cent on the decrease.

Honourable senators, this legislation will also increase the benefits of another group of former prisoners of war, those who were detained by a power other than Japan for a period of more than 30 months. Now they receive a pension based on the 20 per cent disability level. This legislation will increase that level to 25 per cent.

The scale for those prisoners of war was as follows: If they were incarcerated for from three to 18 months, they receive a 10 per cent prisoner of war compensation, equivalent to a 10 per cent disability pension; if they were incarcerated for from 18 to 30 months, they receive a 15 per cent POW compensation; and if they were incarcerated for 30 months and over, they receive 20 per cent.

It was argued by many veterans' organizations that that spread was not enough to recognize those who spent 30 months or more as a prisoner of war. They will now receive 25 per cent.

This increase will benefit 1,550 veterans and widows at an annual cost of $1.28 million. Most of those who will gain are those who were taken prisoner during the Dieppe Raid in 1942. I know that the government has been anxious that the hardships this group endured should be recognized through higher compensation. Over the past five years, veterans' organizations have been trying to press the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, the House of Commons committee and the Minister of Veterans Affairs for this increase, and it should be welcomed by them.

The legislation, all told, will cost the government $20 million over the next four years, depending, of course, on how many veterans are left after those four years. Many of the remaining amendments, honourable senators, are of an administrative nature. I do not believe there is any reason to delay the business of the Senate today by detailing them.

However, I think honourable senators will want to take special note of the amendments dealing with the children of veterans. At present, veterans are paid in respect of a child of a veteran until the child reaches 17. Other social legislation, as honourable senators are aware, regards the child as a dependent until the age of 18. The government wants to bring the Pension Act and the War Veterans Allowances Act into conformity.

Additional educational assistance is being offered to the children of the war dead. Qualifying children receive assistance in the form of a monthly living allowance and a tuition grant. However, they only qualify if they have graduated from high school, and this requirement is penalizing those whose ambitions are not academic. This amendment will extend educational assistance to those who attend trade and technical schools, which is only reasonable, and also the maximum grant will increase from $800 to $1,500 per academic year.

Finally, I will just touch briefly on two other amendments, affecting the spouses of veterans, which I think are important. The first one changes the Veterans Land Act so that for the first time the spouse of a veteran can be included as an owner of the family holdings. Provided the spouse is shown on the property agreement as a "joint owner", there will be no need in future for the veteran's will to be probated in order for the spouse to succeed to the property on the death of the veteran.

Another proposed change will amend the Pension Act. There have been cases where a veteran has died after filing an appeal against a pension assessment. This amendment will permit the spouse or children of such a veteran to follow through with the appeal. This has been very demeaning to veterans' spouses when the veteran appealed a pension prior to death. This now gives the spouse or the children of the veteran the authority to go to the Pension Review Board and appeal a case without the veteran being there, as it were.

Honourable senators, you will have noted that this legislation helps many different groups. It is gratifying that while the government continues to honour its commitment to reduce the deficit, it is once again honouring the debt Canada owes its veterans. I am sure all honourable senators will give this legislation the support it deserves, particularly, honourable senators, because we are adjourning for the Easter break, and the legislation is deemed to come into force on April 1, 1986. By passing this legislation today, there will be no delay in the administration of the payments that will go out next month. I am sure honourable senators will agree that this is important.

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, it is my pleasure to congratulate Senator Marshall on his excellent explanation of the bill. This is a bill which I think all of us can quite properly support. As he has said, it improves the lot of veterans who were prisoners of war. It improves the availability of pensions for spouses, and it extends the age limit for dependent children and increases the aid for students who are children of veterans.

● (1530)

The main group who benefit from this bill are those who were war prisoners in Hong Kong and Dieppe, as Senator Marshall has said. I must say that I had the good fortune not to be among those—as I think most of us did. My army experience was limited to Canada. But I did have the disaster of Dieppe brought home to me when I was assigned to the Special Officers Training Corps Centre in Sussex, New Brunswick. I was told to occupy the bed of one of a group of young officers who had just left for Europe. Within two weeks of our arrival in Sussex, we were informed that 90 per cent of those young officers had been killed in Dieppe. So, I have at least some of the appreciation of the sadness which was caused to the families who lost their loved ones. I think I have, from my knowledge of other veterans, some idea of the hardship that the prisoners encountered both after Dieppe and after Hong Kong.

The Veterans Assistance Program of the Canadian government, after World War II, was the most comprehensive and generous of any program of any of the Allies after the war, but, of course, it needs to be updated. It has to be updated from time to time. This is the most recent of the updating and the adjusting to modern social needs.

I am grateful to the government for understanding this need and reacting to it. I give much of the credit for that to the Honourable George Hees, who had both the seniority and the prestige, as Minister of Veterans Affairs, to have it enacted in the other place.

My reason for giving so much credit to the Honourable George Hees is not only my personal admiration for him, but also because I can see no other reasonable assumption upon which to base the fact of this legislation's having been passed.

The government, sadly, has failed to show a similar understanding and sensitivity to the needs of other elements of our society—the aged, the mothers and the youth. I was rather amused that Senator Marshall began by saying that this was one case in which the Prime Minister had fulfilled his election promises. I was immediately prompted to say, "That's once." I think the count is something like 500 to 1 now, but we are grateful for the one.

Senator Frith: And we are still waiting for the others.

Senator Stanbury: Still waiting. In any event, we do congratulate the government on this piece of legislation and will support its early passage.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I do not want to delay the passage of this bill. I just want to refer to the Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act.

A couple of years ago, in the Senate committee studying the Pension Act, I raised the question of the lack of eligibility for Canadian citizens who are veterans of the Polish Armed Forces of World Wars I and II who fought alongside the Allies in both wars. There are only a few hundred of these veterans in Canada today. I know that their veterans' associations—such as the Polish Combatants Association of Canada—have made several representations to the Ministers of Veterans Affairs in the past, as I have. I am wondering why, in amending this Compensation for Former Prisoners of War Act, the Canadian citizens who are veterans of the Polish armed forces living in Canada are still denied eligibility under this act.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I am aware of the group of Polish veterans that Senator Haidasz—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Marshall speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Haidasz: Actually, my short intervention was a long question, so others may speak if Senator Marshall would like to answer my question now.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Is the point of your question that you were referring to Polish prisoners of war?

Senator Haidasz: Yes.

Senator Marshall: To respond to Senator Haidasz's question, I am well aware of the veterans group to whom he refers, the Polish veterans under General Sznuk, who has been a friend for many years. Each year I have attended with him when he met with the minister on the plight of the Polish veterans.

The minister, at the last meeting we had, indicated his sympathy. However, it is a matter of funding. He said that it is under consideration and the government will be considering it very seriously as the economy improves and they are able to include them in the amendments which will follow over the period of the future.

I appreciate most of the remarks of Senator Stanbury, particularly when he refers to the work that the Honourable George Hees is doing and the fact that we have been able to fulfil many commitments—a statement with which he does not agree—but, certainly, he agrees with what we have done concerning veterans affairs.

Honourable senators, as I indicated before, it is important that we get this bill through all stages today because of the deadline of April 1, but I want to commend Senator Stanbury for the non-partisan attitude he takes and for his support of veterans. I know that all senators feel the same way, and I move second reading.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to ask for leave to proceed to Order No. 10 on the order paper, which is the motion for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders dealing with the procedural guidelines for the financing of various committees.

If Senator Molgat is allowed to deal with this now, we will perhaps be in a better position to consider the various requests for funding which have been put forward.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): I think there is some disposition on the part of honourable senators to deal with Order No. 7. This deals with what most seem to think is a modest budget for the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs to travel to Toronto, New York and Washington, D.C. Perhaps we should grandfather that order by dealing with it now, passing it, and then hearing from Senator Molgat.

As I understand it, two other committees are in the same position. But Senator Nurgitz, I understand, is not under the same pressure, and I have spoken with Senator Gigantès and he is of the same view. However, in the case of the order dealing with the Foreign Affairs Committee, there is some pressure, so perhaps we should deal with it now.

Senator Doody: I have no objection to that procedure. This is a visual presentation of the amount of influence Senator Murray has in this chamber.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

INTERNATIONAL FINANCIAL SYSTEM AND INSTITUTIONS

CANADA'S PARTICIPATION—FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO ADJOURN TO TORONTO, NEW YORK AND WASHINGTON, D.C., FOR PURPOSE OF STUDY

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 7:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator van Roggen, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to examine and report on Canada's participation in the international financial system and institutions and in particular the International Monetary fund, the World Bank Group and the regional development banks, including the debt repayment problems of developing countries, be empowered to adjourn to Toronto, New York and Washington, D.C., for the purpose of such study.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no comment to make. It is just a matter of putting the question.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 10:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Croll, for the adoption of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees), presented in the Senate on 5th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Molgat).

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Molgat speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the adoption of the Seventh Report.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I almost allowed the opportunity to say a few words in this regard pass by, because it seemed to me that there might have been a disposition to accept the report of the committee as proposed. In fairness, I think I should respond to some comments made by Senator Roblin at the time I presented the report, because he did put forward some arguments which have validity and, I think, merit a response as to why the committee proceeded as it did.

I listened carefully to Senator Roblin that day and have since reread his comments. I must say that my views have not changed. I believe the recommendation of the committee, while not perfect, best meets the existing circumstances and the problem we are trying to resolve.

The committee, in its deliberation, wanted to make sure that no attempt was made to prevent any senator from coming forward with a recommendation for an inquiry. It was important for the Senate to retain the practice, which has existed here from the very beginning, that any senator could come forward and suggest that the Senate ought to inquire into a particular subject. The committee also felt that there ought to be a very easy approach to requesting an inquiry. This is one of the elements in the parliamentary system that the Senate could provide and which could not be provided by the other place, that is, very easy access to an inquiry.

We started from the premise that an honourable senator who had an idea that some subject should be studied should be able to express that view here in this chamber, without any inhibitions and without having to go into a detailed budget at that point. The senator would just present the idea so that the first decision would be based on the subject matter. The subject matter of the inquiry would be the matter we had discussed in the chamber.

Subsequently, the other matters of concern would be, of course: Does the Senate have enough members who are not otherwise occupied or who can spend more time in committee? And does the Senate have sufficient dollars to embark upon the study?

According to our present practice, and until we adopt this new rule, an honourable senator will come forward, propose a subject for study, and the Senate will make a decision. If the decision is in the affirmative, the Senate then refers the matter to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which is then bound by the decision of the Senate that the matter should be studied. If a budget is required, the Internal Economy Committee finds itself in a difficult position.

We have tried to get around that by a two-step approach. Senator Roblin has said that we should not have a two-step approach, but that what we should do is insist that a budget is presented at the outset. The reason the committee did not go along that route is that, if it were followed, we would be back in the same bind.

As an example, Senator Kelly now has before us a motion. In making that motion, he would also have had to present a budget or, at least, an idea of how much money the committee would spend. If the Senate were then to approve that, it would really tie the hands of the Internal Economy Committee, because the Senate would then have pronounced itself not only on the principle that terrorism is important, but also—in the knowledge of how much it was going to cost—it would be telling the Internal Economy Committee that it must provide the money. The Internal Economy Committee would then really be in a much worse bind than it is now. That is why we propose the two-step method.

In the first step, the Senate would discuss the merit of the proposition, that is, whether it is worth doing or not. It may be that having approved of the committee's being structured, the committee may not need any money. The committee may decide it can do its work without any kind of budget, in which case it would proceed with its work. If money is required, then the Internal Economy Committee would consider the matter. The Internal Economy Committee at that point would be in a much better position to study the request than it would be otherwise, because it would have all the facts. It would know the budget required and all the other requests that were before the Senate; whereas, if the Senate had already made a decision on the dollars, it would be doing so without that full knowledge that only the Internal Economy Committee would have.

In that second step, the Internal Economy Committee can study the budget, approve it, reduce it or refuse it. It could send the matter back to the committee; the committee would come back to the house with the recommendation from the Internal Economy Committee and the full facts, because the Internal Economy Committee would have studied the matter in the light of all their other obligations, and the Senate could then make a sensible decision.

I recognize that this is a somewhat slower procedure, but I think it is the best way in which we can make informed decisions. Internal Economy would have been able to study the matter thoroughly without undue pressure from the Senate itself, but in full knowledge of the facts.

Honourable senators, that was the reasoning behind the final decisions of the committee. I still recommend them to the Senate. It may be that in practice once we are into the system, we may find that some more changes are required, but I propose that we at least give it a try, see how it works and, if further changes are required, then deal with them at that time.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, would Senator Molgat entertain a question? My question deals with the practice he has outlined and how it affects joint committees.

Senator Molgat: I thank the honourable senator for his question. I noted in reading yesterday's Debates of the Senate that that matter came up. Joint committees did not come under the ambit of our study. They were not part of it, so that nothing we recommend covers joint committees. I should have made that clear in my comments today.

I suppose there should be a study on the question of joint committees, although I do not know whether that is the responsibility of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration or the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders. There could be some problems there. Certainly, according to past practice, as I know it, both houses must pass the resolution before it comes into effect. Then there comes the question of sharing the budget. The standard practice, as I recall it, has been that it has been shared on a 70 per cent-30 per cent basis. However, I do not believe there is anything in writing in that regard. It may mean that when we accept the joint committee, we accept automatically the cost without really knowing what it is. That is an area that could merit some study.

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I presume that the honourable senator's proposal concerns special studies by committees and has nothing to do with the legislative work of committees; is that the case?

Senator Molgat: Yes. The report covers both, but in that report we have separated the two elements into two separate sections. The regular work of committees, which we consider to be bills, the subject matter of bills, and estimates, is an entirely separate matter and is dealt with in one section of our report. The other section concerns special studies, whether undertaken by standing or special committees—which frequently is the case, as, for example, is being done at present by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs. That is covered in the second section of our report.

Senator Murray: The proposal is that with regard to its legislative work, a committee would do what it is now doing, which is to put in a budget prior to the commencement of the fiscal year; and that budget would be approved or otherwise by the committee and by the Senate.

In what vote is the money to be found for special studies? Is there a sum from which the Senate can draw for this, or is it in the overall amount allotted to committees? Where is it in the budget of the Internal Economy Committee?

Senator Molgat: That question should really be addressed to the Internal Economy Committee. I believe that it comes under committee expenses. However, that is really an Internal Economy matter.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

[Senator Nurgitz.]

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I could not make two speeches in one day, so I will yield to Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I should like to thank Senator Marshall for yielding to me. I know that he is anxious to speak in this debate, which is why he adjourned the debate yesterday; and I know that some of my colleagues who served on the committee are also anxious to speak when the Senate resumes following the Easter recess. I again thank Senator Marshall for his courtesy in letting me proceed today.

Honourable senators, today we continue this debate on Canadian youth, its problems and its future, against a background of great emotion and anxiety in this chamber, in this Parliament, and, indeed, all across the country. A subject which ordinarily we find tremendously difficult to get a focus on has, in a short period of time, become the hottest issue in the land. It is not because of dramatic government action; it is not because the special Senate committee travelled across Canada; it is not because of organized protest on the part of youth. I truly wish it were any of the above. Instead, it is because one individual has chosen, of his own free will, to shatter our conventions, to shock our sensibilities, to intrude into the privacy of our consciences, and demand that we stop and listen and hear the cries for help and understanding from our young people. This one man has taken a stark and simplistic symbol—a personal hunger strike aimed at a single program—to force each of us to face the reality that there is a crisis among young Canadians which is poisoning their generation and thereby diminishing the national security and health of their elders and the children who look up to them for guidance.

Today, I do not intend to dwell on my friend and colleague, the Honourable Jacques Hébert, or on Katimavik. No one can speak as eloquently as he himself can about his concerns and convictions—concerns and convictions which I deeply share.

We wait to see what progress the government is making on its program, or on programs that the Prime Minister and others indicated are in the works and may indeed be placed before the country at or about the end of this fiscal year. Nonetheless, as we note today, Senator Hébert is there, it is happening, it affects the dynamics of this debate and every other activity on Parliament Hill. We all know it and feel it, and there is no need to dwell on this reality.

I wish to speak about the reasons that have driven Senator Hébert to this extraordinary protest, because they are at the heart of the work of the Special Senate Committee on Youth and the discoveries made by the members of the committee in the course of that work. The Senate committee commenced in reality a year ago. Despite the fact that we were entering International Youth Year, there was some doubt as to whether we, as a Senate, could afford the special committee. The need for it was questioned back in the fall of 1984. I personally found it rather odd and somewhat disquieting that it had taken some time—indeed, in my view, far too long—to get a special focus on the problems of the youth segment of our population, with the youth minister and with the special Senate committee under the former government—far too long. Given that the climate for youth problems had not improved, it seemed odd that the case had to be argued and fought again.

At any rate, after perhaps a shaky beginning, the committee was actually enlarged and the 12 of us began our work in Ottawa and across the country. I should have said 14, because there was always the presence of the Leader of the Government in the Senate and the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, who were with us in spirit, if not in physical form, as we moved across the country.

It was clear from the start that the job of the committee was not to chronicle how great life was for those who were the success stories—those 80 per cent, God bless them, who had some kind of job or who were thriving at school and university, with the assistance of strong support systems, of family and friends. We rejoiced at every bit of the evidence that such circumstances do exist. But central to our job was to listen and learn how the systems of government and other institutions were working across this country; where the problems were, how deep they were, and what could be done to change or improve the opportunities for those young people who were struggling with their lives.

We knew before we started that there were deep divisions and difficulties in the youth community. The statistics were readily available telling their cold numerical story—those without jobs, those who drop out, suicides, drugs, alcohol, teenage pregnancies. We also knew that there was money in the system to assist, but was it sufficient or was it going in the right direction? Were the methods and goals, the techniques for educating our youth in the broadest sense, really delivering what they had been designed to deliver?

There are no real lobby groups for young people. That is part of the problem. That is why we call them the almost voiceless generation. They have neither the experience nor the resources to put a good case for themselves before the institutions which govern their lives. They are listened to politely, often impatiently, because, after all, as we adults all too often tell them, they are “very young” and they do not “understand” or “fully appreciate what they are talking about.” That is always the classic put down for the young person—things like, “Well, in my day this is the way it was done”, or, “Things were a lot rougher when I was a kid, but we muddled through. What’s the matter with you?”, or things like, “You have your whole life ahead of you, a beautiful future ahead of you.” How selective our memories become with the wisdom of years of learning to rationalize our hopes and ambitions with reality.

The job of our committee was to hear what young people and those who deal with youth had to say and see if we could take their suggestions and produce a report which might offer some guidance for change. It was not, as the Leader of the Government seemed to suggest to me yesterday, a question of producing a balanced document outlining what the government was doing. The question was, “Could it be done better and differently to produce more effective results for its young clients?”

Let there be no doubt about it, honourable senators, our committee was shocked by what we heard at our public hearings. It was not the shock of naivety or new information. It was the shock of getting behind the statistics and seeing the faces of frustration, anger, fear, poverty, discrimination, prejudice, hopelessness, distrust and dull resignation that permeated, in part, each of our hearings.

There were moments of humour and courage and the exhilaration of success, but most particularly we saw in spades the results, or potential results, of a generation at great risk for reasons not of their own making, whether they be economic, cultural or educational. By no means was it just a question of dollars and cents. Everywhere we went, the reality behind the facts and the figures stuck out in ways which one can remember more vividly than any written brief.

I remember Regina where we listened to a professor tell us bluntly that many young people today were facing a future in which they might never have a job, or might never work as we understand it. He spoke of the gap at the core of a young life that creates the danger of civil unrest if it is ignored, a danger than can spread to an entire society.

In St. John’s, Newfoundland, we spoke with eager, articulate young people from Bell Island desperate to live productive lives where they are, but already facing the bleak reality that there are no jobs in the foreseeable future. They told us that when and if they graduated, they were given not graduation parties but going away parties, because they had to go away if they wanted to find work. They cannot get training, and so they face unemployment situations elsewhere in the province, to say nothing of the mainland, which leaves them trapped.

We are talking here about an unemployment rate among young people, 15 to 24 years old, of 95 per cent. There are 146 young people on Bell Island and two of them have work. Very few young people will ever move outside the ranks of the unemployed. One young man learned to become a machinist because that was all the training that was available, even though he knew full well that there were no opportunities whatsoever for getting a job as a machinist.

In Fredericton, an energetic young lady from Saint John told us of a survey her group had conducted of 4,300 young people in that community. Unemployment, drug and alcohol abuse lead the list of concerns. But as the young people got into their survey, another hidden concern became evident. Over and over again young people who were approached, while expressing interest in the survey, either declined to fill it out or asked if they could get some assistance doing so. It became evident that they were illiterate. They could neither read nor write.

Honourable senators, I have just been advised by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that the Deputy Governor General is here to give Royal Assent. I am at the disposal of the Senate, and if it is the wish of honourable senators that I interrupt my remarks now and proceed on another occasion, I shall be glad to do so. If honourable senators wished to resume after Royal Assent, I would also be glad to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Fairbairn, debate adjourned until later this day.

YOUTH

DEBATE CONTINUED

The Senate resumed from earlier this day the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February 1986.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we adjourned during pleasure. Senator Fairbairn had moved the adjournment of the debate on the order to which she was speaking until later this day. I wonder if we can have consent for her to proceed now; then we can deal with the remaining orders.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Thank you, honourable senators. I will not detain you for any length of time this afternoon. As you know, I was just launching into my remarks on the report of the Special Committee on Youth. I have a fair amount left to say.

One of the points I wished to make before concluding for the day was that we had been filled with a great deal of hope earlier today that we would have a substantive announcement from the government concerning its new youth program, which had been alluded to in the House of Commons earlier this week by the Prime Minister as being something that might be announced at or around the end of the fiscal year. It was a considerable letdown for all of us—and I would imagine particularly so for Senator Hébert—to learn that today's announcement was restricted only to the transfer of the Minister of State for Youth from under the umbrella of the Secretary of State to that of the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I suppose we all rejoice in the fact that the Minister of Youth has retained her employment. We also note that she has been given the responsibility of co-ordinating youth programs from within her new position. She will be assisted by a panel of people from the private sector in dealing with employment programs and reviewing employment programs, including a review of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth and another report by a one-man task force from the New Democratic Party.

I suggest again that worthy though these efforts on her part may be, this is far from the substantive announcement that had been indicated. One can, perhaps, conclude that that is yet to come.

It is my intention to carry on, after the Easter break, having heard, I hope, in detail, what this new program or programs of the government will be. It is also my personal hope, when we return, to move the adoption of this Youth Committee report. I will not do that today. It is my hope, on reflection over the Easter break, perhaps, to consider that when we come back.

With those brief remarks, I move that this debate be adjourned to the next sitting of the Senate.

On motion of Senator Fairbairn, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been granted to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs,

- Science and Technology be authorized to publish and distribute its report on its examination of the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, 15th April, 1986, at 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

EASTER GREETINGS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if I may, I would like to thank my colleagues on both sides of the house for the co-operation that we have received during this session.

Senator Hastings: Any time!

Senator Doody: We certainly appreciate the sentiment of Senator Hastings. His co-operation on Bill C-65 is a prime example.

Our legislative agenda is pretty well cleaned up at this point. There is a possibility—a very faint possibility—that some other legislation may come from the other place during the adjournment period that I mentioned, so, as always, we reserve the right to call the Senate back under rule 14A. I do not anticipate that as a probability, but just to cover that—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Shouldn't that be "to ask the Speaker to call the members back"?

Senator Doody: Yes. If I may, rule 14A reads:

If, during any adjournment of the Senate, the Speaker is satisfied that the public interest requires that the Senate meet at a time earlier than that set forth in the motion for such adjournment, the Speaker may call such a meeting by sending a notice to each senator at the latest address of the senator filed with the Clerk of the Senate, informing the senator of the time of the meeting.

That provision is always there, and, if necessary, it can be invoked, but I certainly do not anticipate that it will be.

I take this opportunity of wishing all honourable senators a very happy Easter.

Senator Frith: On our behalf, ditto.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES AND BETWEEN CANADA AND WESTERN ALLIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in view of the serious events which occurred last evening, namely the military operation of the United States against Libyan territory and Libyan installations, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell honourable senators the nature of the consultations which were held between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States to which reference was made in a statement issued by the Prime Minister, and what information was conveyed to the Government of Canada when the intentions of the United States were made known to Canadian authorities?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think that I had better content myself with saying that, before the event took place to which my honourable friend has made reference, a special envoy of the National Security Council visited Ottawa to explain the policy that the Government of the United States was following and to make it clear that they were acting because they believed they had incontrovertible proof of the involvement of the Libyan government in some of the terrorist activities that have been carried out in recent times. So we were told that they thought they had incontrovertible proof of the involvement of the Libyan government in the situation and that they intended to make selective, and what is called in modern terminology, surgical strikes to respond to some of these activities and to give us some indication of the seriousness with which they viewed this situation.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has mentioned that the consultation was undertaken by a special envoy who was a member of the National Security Council. Can the Leader of the Government tell us the identity of that envoy with whom discussions were held in Ottawa?

Senator Roblin: I think I had better say that he was sent on the instructions of the President of the United States, but I shall have to take advice as to whether I can give further details at the present time.

Senator MacEachen: Were there any discussions held between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, or between the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada and the Secretary of State for the United States on this matter, or did the consultation take the form of a visit of an official of the American government to Ottawa? If that is the case, and the consultation was undertaken on the American side by an official, with whom did he consult while in Ottawa?

Senator Roblin: I can tell my friend that this matter has been the subject of conversations between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada.

Senator MacEachen: I am interested in that. Is it true, then, that the President advised the Prime Minister personally that he had authorized or that he proposed to carry out this action against Libya?

Senator Roblin: I have no information as to what took place in those discussions.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask when those discussions took place between the President and the Prime Minister?

Senator Roblin: I shall try to find out the answer to that question.

Senator MacEachen: So we do not know whether any recent discussions have taken place between the President and the Prime Minister. One could interpret the answer to mean that the question of Libyan terrorism was discussed on the occasion of the Prime Minister's visit to Washington some considerable time ago.

● (1410)

The Prime Minister issued a statement last evening to the effect that the Government of Canada had been fully consulted by the United States and was notified in advance of its intentions with respect to Libya.

The Leader of the Government has told us that an official of the National Security Council came to Ottawa yesterday and met unidentified persons. Can he tell us with whom that official met yesterday?

Senator Roblin: I would not like my honourable friend to assume that that particular meeting I referred to is the only discussion that has taken place between the two governments on the matter. That is the latest one. That is all I can say about that.

The Prime Minister has been in touch with the President subsequent to his visit to Washington.

Senator MacEachen: Was the Prime Minister in touch with the President with respect to this action taken by the United States against Libya? When the intentions of the United States had been formulated and conveyed to the Government of Canada through this envoy, was the Prime Minister then in touch with the President or with any other official of the United States?

Senator Roblin: My friend is asking for the sequence of discussions. I will find out what I can tell him about the sequence of discussions.

Senator MacEachen: Did the honourable leader use the word "secrets"?

Senator Roblin: The sequence.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, the sequence.

I should like to know whether the consultation that took place was a real consultation between heads of government on this very important matter, or whether it was simply a communication conveyed by an official to persons in Ottawa. And again I ask with whom that official met in Ottawa.

Senator Roblin: I shall take advice as to how far I can go in answering these questions because they concern discussions between the Government of Canada and the government of another country. I want to be quite sure as to the facts that I am authorized to give on this matter.

Senator MacEachen: I am astonished that the Leader of the Government is timid about saying with whom that official met in Ottawa. What is tender or sensitive about that?

May I follow up and ask another question. The Prime Minister stated last night, and I quote:

We accept President Reagan's statement that Libya was involved in the perpetration of terrorist attacks.

I want to ask whether such evidence was produced by the American authorities, and if so, whether that evidence was examined by Canadian officials to convince them that the President's statement was correct.

The German Foreign Minister is reported to have stated yesterday that he had seen the evidence and he did not find it convincing. I want to know whether Canadian officials saw the evidence or whether they were simply told by the Americans that Libya was involved and whether we accepted that statement by the Americans at face value.

Senator Roblin: My friend is asking me for details of discussions of which I am not aware. I was not at the meeting, as my friend knows, so I will have to obtain further information before I can answer that question.

But I think I should observe that this is an improvement over the situation that we were faced with when Grenada was invaded, because in this instance we were consulted in considerable depth and to a high degree during the course of the activity.

Senator MacEachen: I am not sure whether this is an improvement or not. There is no possible parallel to be drawn between the two incidents. If the Leader of the Government remembers, the United States government did not even consult Her Majesty's government in connection with the invasion of Grenada. I am surprised the Leader of the Government would cite that as a difference in this case. In that particular case, Her Majesty's government was not consulted, even though Her Majesty is Queen of Grenada. Canada was not consulted either. In this particular case, the United Kingdom gave permission to the United States to overfly its territory, and Canada was consulted. You say there is a difference, but I think you are comparing two totally different situations.

The Leader of the Government has told us that he cannot tell us anything about those discussions. I am not asking for the internal two-way discussion; I want to know if the American envoy presented evidence to the Canadian government that convinced the Canadian government that these acts were perpetrated by Colonel Khadafy. That is all I want to know. Did you get evidence that convinced you?

Senator Roblin: Well, I got the import of the question the first time; my friend did not have to ask it a second time. I told him I will see what information I can give him. If he cannot see the difference between not being consulted about Grenada and being consulted about this incident, then I think he is being rather obtuse.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I must say that it may be necessary to instruct the Leader of the Government a little more about what happened, because the Government of the United Kingdom was treated in precisely the same way as the Government of Canada was on that occasion. On this occasion the Government of the United Kingdom was treated in precisely the same way as the Government of Canada. So there was an exactly parallel situation in both instances with respect to Canada and the United Kingdom. But I am asking about the evidence, and the honourable Leader of the Government has said that he will try to find out.

Now may I ask this question: When the envoy came to Ottawa and told the Government of Canada, "We intend to have this air strike. We intend to attack the territory of Libya," what did the Government of Canada say? Did it make any comment? Did it disapprove, or did it approve?

Senator Roblin: I would like to come back to the Grenada situation. There is a great deal of difference.

Senator MacEachen: No doubt you would. In your place I would too.

Senator Roblin: On that first occasion my honourable friend was not consulted; neither was the Government of the United Kingdom. That is a fact. On this occasion the Government of Canada was consulted and the Government of the United Kingdom was consulted. That is the fact.

Senator MacEachen: Yes, exactly. So what conclusion do you draw?

Senator Roblin: Well, in one case we were not told about it at all. In this case we were informed. That is the difference,—

Senator Frith: Because it's convenient.

Senator Roblin: A very clear and obvious difference, and my honourable friend is doing his best to fudge it, but he can't do it.

Senator MacEachen: But, get on to Libya! Tell us some new information about it.

Senator Roblin: Well, you get on to it. All that I am going to say in respect of this matter has already been said by the Prime Minister. My friend need not expect me to say anything more than that. The Prime Minister made a statement today in respect of this matter and I would be glad to read it to my honourable friend. It reads as follows:

Our prime concern all along in the Libyan crisis has been the safety of Canadians. Our consul in Tripoli has informed us that he has contacted the Canadian community throughout Libya. He has reported that no Canadians have been killed or injured as a result of last night's events. Another officer from the Canadian Embassy in Tunis is being dispatched urgently to Libya to assist Canadians.

Although United States' intention was scrupulously to avoid civilian targets, we profoundly regret the loss of innocent life.

As the government has made it clear many times in the past, terrorism is reprehensible and an evil which all members of the international community must work to eliminate.

The United States was seeking to do precisely that and Canada supports that objective.

We are concerned, however, lest the cycle of violence continue.

Canada considers that terrorism cannot permanently be eradicated without resolving the root political problems which give rise to it. We urge, therefore, a renewal by all concerned to reach negotiated settlements to the tensions that have long plagued the middle east.

That is the government's statement on that.

Senator MacEachen: May I ask the Leader of the Government whether the Canadian government made any comment about the intentions of the United States to conduct a strike against Libya? Did it say, "We are concerned. Don't do it!"

Or did it say, "Go ahead, you have our blessing"? I want to know.

Senator Roblin: It accepted the word of the United States government that they had concrete evidence of the involvement of the Libyan government in this thing and therefore considered that what the United States government did was understandable in terms of their priorities. As far as the Canadian government is concerned, it does not think that the cycle of violence should be allowed to escalate, if it is humanly possible to prevent it, and that we should do what we can to get to the root causes of this problem.

Senator MacEachen: So we have a statement from the Leader of the Government that the Government of Canada saw no evidence. It took the word of the United States that there was incontrovertible evidence.

● (1420)

Secondly, it approved the actions of the United States in undertaking this strike.

I want to ask the Leader of the Government, in light of the fact that the ministers of the European Community were meeting yesterday with this matter as their main agenda item and in light of the fact that the Prime Minister was recently in France and in other parts of Europe where he repeated the intention of the Canadian government to seek even closer relations with the Government of France, did the Prime Minister or the Government of Canada have any consultations with other allies, including France, with respect to the intentions that had been disclosed by the United States?

Senator Roblin: I want to go back to the first part of my honourable friend's question in which he referred to the question of proof about the involvement of the Libyan government. I did not make any statement about that with respect to what information we had received. I told my friend that I would make inquiries to find out what information we had received. I would not like his statement to be contradicted on the record, because I do not believe that it is correct.

The other part of his question is: What consultations did we have with our other allies? I wish he would extend his question to include not only France but the NATO countries which are, perhaps, more closely associated with us than any other group of countries. I will ascertain what consultations took place in that respect.

Senator MacEachen: I would hope that, before giving its support to the action taken by the United States, the Government of Canada would have convinced itself, on the basis of evidence, that Colonel Khadafy had been implicated in these terrorist acts.

The Leader of the Government has now stated that he will try to get that information. I would have hoped that, before taking a position on a matter of this importance, the Government of Canada would have consulted other allies, including France, the United Kingdom and West Germany, two of whom have been violently opposed to the action taken by the United States. Why would Canada base its action solely on a single visit from an official from the United States and not take a wider sampling of opinion?

Senator Roblin: Of course, it is my honourable friend's assumption that we took our action solely on the basis of a single visit from a representative of the United States. That, of course, is not correct. This decision was arrived at over the term of the crisis which did not develop overnight; it has been with us for some time. We had plenty of opportunity to know that the situation was becoming difficult.

What is particularly in question now is the precise form American action was to take, and that is what we have been talking about.

As for the idea that we have just suddenly decided to do this thing, I think that is quite mistaken. The government has been considering the whole of this matter, along with its allies, over an extensive period of time, and we have come to our conclusions as a result of our assessment of the situation.

Senator MacEachen: I am bound to ask, if this has been considered over an extensive period of time, when first did the United States tell Canada that it intended to undertake this military strike?

The Leader of the Government says that it has been considered over an extensive period of time. Are we to believe now that some ten days ago the United States told Canada it intended to do this, or did that information come yesterday?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows perfectly well that I am not talking about a decision being made ten days ago to strike Libya, because, as far as I know, it was not made ten days ago.

What I am telling him is that the question of American-Libyan relations, the question of terrorism, the question of appropriate response and the possibility that the Americans would take some action, as they have done, have been with us for some time. Was what took place in the Gulf of Sidra, for example, not a military event of some importance? My honourable friend knows perfectly well that this whole question is not something that blew up yesterday or the day before, but is a matter that has been under consideration by governments around the world for some time, and that is what I meant when I talked about the lapse of time over which this matter has been maturing.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government cannot shift the ground completely to suit his own inadequacies in answering questions. He said that the matter we have been discussing—namely, the intention to strike against Libya—has been the subject of a lot of discussion over an extensive period of time. Having said that, he now reverses himself and relates it to an entirely different series of events. We all know that the matter of Libyan terrorism has been under discussion, but what happened yesterday was a major military action taken by the United States against Libya.

I am trying to find out from the minister what consultations were undertaken by the United States with Canada, and I have found out virtually nothing from him. I am very disappointed that the Senate cannot hear information from a member of the government, who now appears unready to tell us even the name of the person who came to Ottawa yesterday. He appears unwilling to tell us the names of the members of the Government of Canada who met with that person. He appears unwilling to tell us the sequence of events and the evidence that was heard. We have received nothing from the member of the government who is answering in this chamber for a very important action that could affect the future peace of the Middle East and, as a result, of the world. We deserve better.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: It is interesting to see that my honourable friend regards the activity in the Gulf of Sidra as being of no importance in terms of leading up to this event, because it certainly was. It is interesting to see that he is trying to get me to say that I have to restrict my replies to the particular incident that took place yesterday. Of course I do, and I am going to get the answers that my honourable friend seeks. But for him to suggest that this situation has not developed over a considerable period of time is quite unrealistic and quite untrue.

I say to my honourable friend that he knows perfectly well that while I have the responsibility for answering questions in this chamber, I am not the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I am not the Minister of National Defence and I am not the Prime Minister. I have to go to the best source to get the answers that he seeks. If he wants me to extemporize on my feet this afternoon as to the answers to his questions, he is mistaken because I am not going to do it. But I will undertake to get answers to any reasonable questions he asks. That has always been my stance. I think it is quite uncalled for that he suggests that I should be in a position to answer all of the questions on any topic that anyone wishes to raise in this house, because I am not able to do so. He knows that very well.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows that I have to take advice on the answers I give, particularly on a matter of this kind. How irresponsible it would be of me—

Senator Frith: To prepare yourself?

Senator Roblin: —to try to satisfy his questions when I have to seek the information from the proper source, and he knows that. I am not going to be coaxed into that no-man's-land of trying to respond to his questions simply because he wants the answer now. He is going to get the answer when I am able to provide it to him. I will, in my usual style, get it for him as soon as I can and in the greatest detail possible.

Senator Frith: In his usual style, quite right. He might have prepared himself for it.

Senator MacEachen: I might say that the comments of the Leader of the Government deserve at least one rejoinder; namely, that we on this side do not expect the Leader of the Government to come into the house with all of the details of every active government policy. But we do expect that when an event of the importance of the strike against Libya occurs, when the whole world has focused upon it, when the President of the United States gives a press conference and the Secretary of Defense and the Secretary of State give press conferences, and when an envoy from the United States comes to this country, as happened yesterday, in the intervening time the Leader of the Government should have taken the trouble to inform himself on what has happened.

Senator Frith: Exactly. Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: I think it is irresponsible of the Leader of the Government to have come into the house unprepared and to have said that he will get the answers and that we ought not to expect anything better.

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend is really not as reasonable as he could be. He knows perfectly well that I have not been sitting in my office, twiddling my thumbs over this matter or any other matter. I have to anticipate as best I can what questions will be asked. I am telling him that I am really not able to anticipate all of the questions he is going to ask. He is a man who ran the foreign affairs of this country for some time. He probably knows more about them than anyone else in this chamber—certainly more than I do. I try to arm myself with the information that is available at a particular time, and that is what I have done. If my honourable friend thinks up questions which I am not able to answer, I am not a bit surprised, because I cannot anticipate every question that he will ask.

As for this chamber's being informed, it will be informed, but one has to remember that those who are responsible for conducting government policy are not in this house. They are in the other house, and I daresay that today there is a very active question period taking place on that side. But one cannot ask a member of the cabinet, who is without portfolio, who has to cover the whole range of questions that might be asked on this subject and any other, to have all of the answers at this fingertips, because that just will not happen. It never happened on previous occasions when I was on the other side, and it is not going to happen now. What my honourable friend is entitled to, and what he will get, is a respectful hearing of the points that he makes. He will get my assurance that I will get what information I can properly give him; and he can also be assured that I will do my best not to give him any misinformation, because I am being needled by him to answer questions in this house at the present time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government. Whether or not he anticipated the question today, I am sure that it is a matter that has occupied a great deal of his attention and that of his colleagues in committee meetings of the cabinet, because it has been touted from time to time as being one of the highest priorities of this government. I refer to the free trade negotiations with the United States. I ask the Leader of the Government: What is the present position of the government in light of the fact that a majority of the United States Senate Finance Committee, including its chairman, have indicated that they are unwilling to grant authority to the administration to enter into negotiations with Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think the position of the government is very straightforward. We are going to wait to see what decision is made by the Senate of the United States with respect to this matter. We have been disappointed—let us be frank about it—and surprised—let us be frank about that too—that this situation has developed, because the best information we were able to obtain—and, so far as I could tell, it was the same information that was available also to the United States administration—was that the committee would deal favourably with this matter. It may still do so; but we have to recognize the fact that this is the responsibility and the prerogative of the Congress and the administration of the United States. They are the people who have to decide this. It is not something that we can decide. We will simply have to bide our time and see what decision that committee makes when it reaches its determination some time soon.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, I guess I am surprised that the Leader of the Government would again use the term that has been reported from time to time to have been used by several ministers, that is that the Canadian government was surprised that the members of the United States Senate were of the opinion that they expressed recently, namely, that there were a number of severe irritants in the Canada-United States trading relations that were of such high priority, from their point of view, that they had to be dealt with. I should like to ask the Leader of the Government whether or not the Canadian government intends to consider and acquiesce—if that is the right word, although perhaps it is too strong—in some of the terms and conditions that have been spelled out by a number of the members of the United States Senate committee, but particularly by the chairman, concerning softwood, and so on.

Further, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can give us some indication as to why he and his colleagues continue to use the word “surprised”. That almost borders on being misleading, because surely they have been listening to what those members of the United States Senate, and indeed members of the other house of Congress, have been saying for weeks, namely, that they do not intend to ease up on the foreign trade negotiations unless and until some other conditions are met with respect to some of their concerns in terms of what we all refer to as protectionism, and, indeed, it is protecting some of the interests of their constituents.

Senator Roblin: Let us be clear about this. I do not think the government is surprised about the position of Senator Packwood, or of Senator Baucus, or of other people who are interested in timber. Their position is well known. They have been anxious to have something done about it that we are not willing to do at the present time. What is surprising is that apparently they claim to have a majority of the committee who think as they do, even though they are people who, up until the present time, have expressed no views in connection with this particular issue. That is the surprise, and not that there were problems in the committee. The surprise is that a majority of the committee members are claimed by Senator Packwood as being opposed to the policy of the United States government in this matter. That is the surprise; and if my honourable friend thinks that it is curious that we were surprised, then I should say that so was the United States administration—and, according to the newspaper reports, which I cannot verify, so indeed were staff members of that committee. They did not expect that there would be this majority opposed to action by the administration—and there may not be. The die has not yet been cast. The committee has not yet decided. So we will wait until it does.

Senator Olson: I understand that the vote is expected tomorrow. It may not happen, but that is when it is expected. It may be that we can give some credence to the size, because, as I understand it, there were only two members of that committee who indicated they were willing to support it. I am not sure of both their names, but Senator Moynihan was one of them. What the government now seems to be indicating, or what is being reported, is that there is some intensified lobbying going on to try to change the statement of intentions before the vote is taken either tomorrow or on Thursday. Can the Leader of the Government indicate what “lobbying” in the United States means with respect to this matter?

Senator Roblin: Well, there are all kinds of speculation about it, on which I am not able to comment. All I can say is that this is a matter that is domestic to the United States. I do not believe that the Canadian government would be lobbying United States senators on that committee to change their views, because it is a matter that they themselves have to decide. It is a matter between them and the administration of the United States. I think we would take it rather poorly if someone came up here to try to influence us while we were debating a matter in that sense. So I do not think it would be expected that we should do the same down there.

Senator Olson: That is why I asked the question, because I believe there is some resentment, and perhaps even some impropriety, in another government’s lobbying members of a foreign legislative body. It seems to me that there have been several officials, at least, if not members of the government, who have indicated that they expect some results from intense lobbying, or from “intensified lobbying”—I believe that is the term they have used. That is why I wanted to know what it meant.

Senator Roblin: We have to be a little careful about what we are lobbying for, because I know perfectly well that members of the Canadian Parliament have lobbied members of the Congress in the United States. Senator Guay could perhaps remind me of the name of the dam in North Dakota in connection with which Canadian parliamentarians, both federal and provincial, lobbied the members of Congress; and certainly we have done so in other cases, such as fisheries. However, on this particular point, where a committee of the United States Senate is seized of this question, I do not think it is appropriate for us to lobby them.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, is the Leader of the Government saying that the Canadian Ambassador in the United States is not lobbying the American senators like mad at this very moment? Is he saying that that would be inappropriate?

Senator Roblin: I am not saying that. I do not know what the Canadian Ambassador to the United States is doing with respect to this matter. I thought my friend was asking me what the members of the Canadian government were doing, and I tried to answer that.

Senator Olson: What they were doing not only personally, but also on the instructions of others—which includes the ambassador, by the way.

Senator Roblin: Members of the Canadian government are not lobbying the United States senators. What other activities are going on, I am not aware of at the present time.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, as a supplementary, has the government studied what it might think would be the possibility of getting any trade agreement between Canada and the United States through the Congress? Is there not a real possibility that even if such a treaty were agreed upon, the Congress would oppose the treaty and would fail to pass it; and therefore all of the effort that Canada has put into these negotiations would be for naught?

Senator Roblin: Of course, that is entirely possible; but we will never know until we get further on in the negotiations.

Senator Argue: My question was: Is it correct to say that the Canadian government, having looked at the composition of the Congress, and at its stand in recent years with regard to protectionism, still thinks there is really a hope in hell of getting a treaty through the American Congress? Why does the Canadian government continue to make concessions—and I believe concessions are being made—to the United States while these discussions are going on to make it easier for Americans to come into Canada and gobble up our industries? Now, the government is capitulating to the pharmaceutical industry through the bill to open up the patent laws so that the Americans can make greater use of them, and Canadians will be denied cheaper drugs. Why do we not quit making concessions?

● (1440)

Senator Roblin: I see that my honourable friend is not really a supporter of the free trade initiative in any respect.

Senator Olson: He wants some results.

Senator Roblin: So do we, but it takes two to tango.

Senator Frith: Excellent metaphor.

Senator Roblin: One has to remember that though the United States government may have a policy, they are not able to deliver the Congress in the same way the Government of Canada can assure the assent of the Parliament of Canada, as long as it holds a majority in the House. It is a different situation.

Senator MacEachen: What about the Senate?

Senator Roblin: The Government of Canada cannot deliver five cents in the Senate, because my honourable friend over there controls the majority.

Senator Argue: Come on, Duff, we are no problem.

Senator Roblin: This is the case, even though my honourable friend does not represent anybody. He does not represent a soul, and he is not responsible in any democratic sense. Yet, under our Constitution, he has the power to frustrate the House of Commons and the elected Government of Canada. That is the situation here.

Senator Olson: You have described it wrongly.

Senator Argue: I am sure that we are your biggest worry.

Senator Frith: What tigers we are!

Senator Roblin: If the Americans were aware of that situation, and if they knew about the anti-free trade sentiment that is rife in the Liberal Party, they might be asking the Prime Minister of Canada whether he can deliver the Senate of Canada. That is a question we will get to one of these days.

Senator MacEachen: We had better start. We want Reagan to come to us.

Senator Argue: My question is, why are we giving away the Canadian shop for an agreement that is not likely to be passed in any event?

Senator Roblin: Of course, that is precisely what we are not doing. If we were giving away the Canadian shop, we would be making a deal in lumber, but we are not making a deal in lumber.

Senator Argue: You are making a deal on drugs. Yeutter told you to get going.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can say that, but that matter is not part of the trade negotiations in any respect. We are not giving away the shop, and we do not intend to give away the shop. Unless we can get a reasonable deal, we will not make a deal, and my honourable friend can solace himself with that statement.

Senator Argue: Why should the Canadian Government march to the orders of Clayton Yeutter, who is the chief negotiator for the United States in the trade talks, on a question of generic drugs?

Senator Roblin: One might ask, why should the American government march to the tune of some Canadian spokesman? The answer is that they do not, and we do not.

Senator Argue: Is that the only reason you have?

Senator Frith: You accepted what they had to say about Libya.

Senator Roblin: That is not part of the trade discussions.

Senator Frith: No, but it shows what you will give away and how tough you are.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, my conclusion of this discussion would be to give notice to the Leader of the Government that, in view of the way he wrapped himself in sackcloth and ashes a few minutes ago about how innocent he was of what goes on in cabinet committee meetings—

Senator Argue: He doesn't do that.

Senator Olson: Well, he tried it a few minutes ago. I merely want to give him notice that after the vote in the Senate, I intend to raise a number of times the question of what the government's intention will be with respect to foreign policy, particularly as it applies to economic and trade matters. I hope that he will be ready for it.

Senator Roblin: I am always ready for my honourable friend, and he has never yet been able to stump me.

Senator Frith: Oh, my God! How ready are you when we do not get information for weeks and sometimes we have to go and get it ourselves?

Senator Roblin: You get the answers you deserve.

Senator Frith: Oh, yes, as you see it.

Senator Roblin: Of course, as I see it. You will just have to sit there and listen.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—POSITION OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, a few moments ago the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicated, to the relief of all of us I am sure, that there had been communication with the Canadian community in Libya, and it is our understanding that no one from that community has been killed or injured. Would the Leader of the Government tell us whether there has been any indication of Canadians wishing to leave Libya as a result of this contact that was made?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as far as we know at the present time and according to the advice of our representatives in Libya, the Canadian community does not feel itself threatened, and there does not seem to be any significant trend toward Canadians leaving that country.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. It was mentioned today that three Canadian Hercules aircraft were standing by in Lahr, West Germany, should the occasion arise for Canadians to be airlifted out of Libya. Would the government leader indicate to the Senate whether the Canadian government has requested permission for those aircraft to land in Libya, should our nationals request to be taken out.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, we have had discussions with our allies in Europe with respect to contingency plans for the removal of Canadians who might wish to leave under certain circumstances. I do not think I should go beyond that comment at the present time.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—ROLE OF LOBBYIST

Hon. David A. Croll: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. According to American press reports, we have on our payroll the very best lobbyist in Washington, a fellow named Weaver, I think the name is, who just resigned from the President's staff. Those press reports state that we pay him $500,000 per year. I believe that they are true. What kind of service are we getting from our lobbyists when this fellow Weaver does not know what is going on even though he has been on the job for months?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The man's name is Michael Deaver—

Senator Frith: You ought to know how to spell his name if you are making out the cheques!

Senator Roblin: It has been said that he is a Canadian lobbyist, and I guess he is. I shall have to find that out. However, I would be surprised if he were getting $500,000 per year from the Canadian government. I shall see what I can find out about the matter.

Senator Olson: But what he is doing is proper, though.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not know. You see, you are damned if you do and you are damned if you don't. The other governments in this world, particularly the Government of Japan, recognized long ago that it was important to have the assistance of people like Mr. Deaver in the capital city of the United States, and I think they have benefited from that. We have eschewed anything of that sort over many a long year. It is only now that we are beginning to think that there might be some advantage to be gained by such a move. I think it would be wrong for us to say that we should not undertake these arrangements with people in order to deal with the type of government that exists in Washington. We have to recognize the way in which it operates and govern our activities accordingly. So I would not be inclined to apologize for Mr. Deaver yet. Maybe he is no good and maybe he is being paid too much, but I do not know that. I think it is important that we have the best means of representing our views in the United States that we can find.

Senator Frith: Perhaps he gave you the information about Grenada.

Senator Roblin: He never got it from the U.S. Government, that's for sure. You were sitting there waiting, too.

Senator MacEachen: Like Her Majesty.

Senator Roblin: You are no better than they are.

Senator MacEachen: Indeed not.

Senator Croll: Honourable senators, I think the Government of Canada is doing the proper thing in hiring the very best men they can get. We should have done it a long time ago. However, that is not my question. If we are hiring the very best men, Mr. Deaver ought to know what is going on within the Senate committee rooms. He ought to be on the job. The kind of production I have referred to does not speak well for the people that we are hiring. We are entitled to something better, and why are we not getting it?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I always listen to any remarks made by my honourable friend with a good deal of sympathy because I respect his views. My suspicion is that Mr. Deaver was not hired to be an adviser or communications link with respect to foreign policy. I think that his responsibilities have more to do with internal policy, particularly with respect to such things as acid rain. My friend should also recognize that it was not only the Canadian government that was surprised by the fact that the majority of this committee is going to be hard to handle, if I can put it that way, but the U.S. administration itself was too. If they were not fully informed of the matter, how could anyone else be?

Senator Perrault: Don't give him his Christmas bonus this year.

Senator Croll: A good lobbyist is never surprised.

MULTICULTURALISM

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, last weekend in that great city of Toronto, the centre of the ethnic community of this country, the Minister of State for Multiculturalism stated that the multiculturalism policy of the government will be given a new face; namely, a new direction—business enterprises. Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate state whether that means the cutting of existing multicultural programs?

● (1450)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, I cannot say that. I will have to ask my colleague as to whether any changes are going to be made.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. While the Leader of the Government in the Senate is inquiring about that matter, could he also find out for us what additional funds have been allocated to bring this new direction towards multiculturalism into place?

Senator Roblin: I do not think my honourable friend should assume that there are additional funds. I do not know, but it is certainly an assumption I would not make without inquiring. I think my friend will find that there may be a re-ordering of funds.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN GRAIN STABILIZATION ACT—SUGGESTED AMENDMENT

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, on Monday of this week, the Minister of State for the Canadian Wheat Board made a very important announcement, namely that substantial sums of money were being paid out to producers under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. I think the fact that he can make that announcement demonstrates the wisdom that was used by Otto Lang many years ago in bringing forth that act and having it approved by Parliament. I think it is a good act that is serving us well in times of great difficulty.

My question, however, is: Is the government giving consideration to possible amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act in order to make it possible for farmers in a drought area, or for farmers who have a crop failure, to pay into the fund more money than they are now allowed to pay so that when a payment is made out they will no longer be in the position that they are in today, namely, that those who need it most because of drought or crop failure will be getting much less than those who had the good fortune to get good crops and were therefore able to pay more into the fund? I say this with respect, because I am trying to be constructive, but I think that amendments along that line could be made on the basis of the value of grain that could be grown on an individual farm in a normal year, according to the crop insurance records. I think farmers should have the opportunity to elect to pay in on the basis of an average crop so that they would be able to receive a rather substantial sum when large payments are being made out, rather than making the very small payments they are now allowed to make. As the minister well knows, the payment is based on the contributions made in the most recent three years, and, of course, in the area that I come from and in southern Alberta and now, of course, in the Peace River and in many other areas, there are farmers who have had two or three years of what are virtually crop failures. I think such an amendment should be considered.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think it is correct to say that the Western Grain Stabilization Act is a good one. It was widely supported when it was first introduced and has been considerably improved by the present administration when we made some amendments to it the other day. Now we see the value of this fund which, this spring, will provide $580 million to farmers who badly need it. This amount is in addition to some $520 million that was paid out, I think, some six months ago. Therefore it has been a great form of assistance.

As I understand it, the principle of the Western Grain Stabilization Act is to deal with price fluctuations. That is the main aim. However, crop insurance is something a little different. My honourable friend has raised the point that if you have three or four bad years in a row, then there are problems. I think the government would prefer to address this through amendments to the Crop Insurance Act rather than through the Western Grain Stabilization Act. If my memory is correct, work is already under way to bring in amendments to the Crop Insurance Act which will deal with this question of what happens when you have three bad years in a row. The present insurance arrangements are something less than completely satisfactory.

Senator Argue: I think any consideration being given to improving current crop insurance is wise because, as the minister knows, a farmer who has a number of crop failures is then penalized, whether or not those crop failures were clearly an act of God or whether they had something to do with bad farming practices and that, of course, is very unfair. I would imagine that that is, at least, a major part of the problem that the government will be looking at, and that is fine.

However, that does not in any way detract from the question I asked. For a person who does have a total crop failure and who gets the best possible pay-out under crop insurance, I would put it to the minister that that cannot be of as much value as it would have been if it were linked to an average crop because you do not get 100 per cent insurance. I would therefore ask the government, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, to take my suggestion and consider it, rather than merely saying, "We are doing something else," because I think there is an area for much-needed improvement.

Senator Roblin: It is perfectly true that the farmer has a hard time on two counts: first, he is not in control of his prices; and, second, he is not in control of the weather, so we have developed these two pieces of legislation to try to mitigate the adverse effects.

I myself happen to believe that crop insurance is the way to go, but my honourable friend has made a suggestion and I shall have no hesitation at all in passing it on to my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Argue: I would like to point out again, if I may, that while the Western Grain Stabilization Act has to do with general cash flow and the general price level, it is of very little value to a person who does not have a crop. I would submit that the person who does not have a crop should be given the same opportunity to receive the extra money that comes from the Western Grain Stabilization fund, over and above a crop and over and above crop insurance. I think that they are two different subjects.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to refer to the statement which the Leader of the Government put on the record earlier today in response to one of my questions. I would like to read one sentence which was read by the Leader of the Government, as follows:

We are concerned, however, lest the cycle of violence continue.

[Senator Roblin.]

Canada considers that terrorism cannot permanently be eradicated without resolving the root political problem which give rise to it.

That is the end of my quotation.

Can the Leader of the Government clarify what he means or what the Prime Minister meant by the expression "the root political problem"? Is that intended to convey—and if it is, I would disagree with it—that the actions of Colonel Khadafy are the result of the dispute which exists between the Arab countries and Israel? What is the "root political problem"?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am not going to say what the Prime Minister intended to say because I do not know that, but I can tell my friend what I think it means. I think it means that the root problem is terrorism. Terrorism is not restricted to Colonel Khadafy. There is a wide range of terroristic problems throughout the world. One of the sources of that problem is undoubtedly the Arab-Israeli dispute and while the settling of that dispute, or indeed any other, is no guarantee that we would eliminate terrorism from the world, it would be a mighty good place to start.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I think the question is quite important, because this is the Prime Minister saying:

Canada considers that terrorism cannot be permanently eradicated without resolving the root political problem which give rise to it.

In other words, "the root political problem" which gives rise to terrorism. My question is: What is the root political problem?

Senator Roblin: I simply repeat my statement. I think we would start with the Arab-Israeli question and if we could get that settled, we would be making good progress.

Senator MacEachen: So the government is saying in this statement that the terrorism perpetrated by Colonel Khadafy is the direct result of the Arab-Israeli conflict. I would be very sceptical of that conclusion, and I hope the government will take steps to remove that impression.

● (1500)

Senator Roblin: That is not what the government said; that is what I said. That is the advantage my friend has over me all the time. He wants a reply to a statement which bears on government policy that is not within my orbit of knowledge; I cannot give him that. But in an effort to encourage him in the discharge of his responsibilities, I have tried to give him what I think was some constructive comment on what he has said.

I am the man who said that the Israeli-Arab conflict is part of the problem, and, if it were resolved, it would help us to eradicate terrorism. But I am not the man who said that that would solve the entire problem, and that is all there would be to it, because everybody knows that is not the case. There are other terrorists in the world who have nothing whatsoever to do with that conflict. But if we could get that problem solved, we would make good progress.

Senator MacEachen: I am not going to press the Leader of the Government for his personal interpretation, but I think it is important to know what the Prime Minister meant when he said "that terrorism cannot permanently be eradicated without resolving the root political problem which give rise to it."

I should like to know—and I give notice to the Leader of the Government—what is the root political problem which gives rise to terrorism, namely, the action of Khadafy?

The leader has said that he has expressed the personal view that it is the Arab-Israeli conflict, in part. I think that is taking a long step. Without pressing it further, I think we are entitled to a clarification from the government as to whether it believes that the Arab-Israeli conflict is the cause of Khadafy's actions, and that if there were a peace settlement, the root political problem would disappear.

Senator Roblin: I think it is perfectly clear that no one can guarantee that terrorism will disappear if Colonel Khadafy disappears. That is jejune; nobody thinks that. Nobody thinks that that particular statement refers only to Colonel Khadafy. Terrorism is not restricted to Colonel Khadafy; it is all over the place. We have it in Canada, where it is thought to be by Sikhs, but who knows?

It is not a simple problem, and it is not possible to say that one particular political problem is the cause when we know that there are many, but the central fact is that there is an atmosphere, a sentiment, a feeling in the world today which lights a fire under terrorism and makes people do things which, in their right frame of mind, possibly they would never do.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to conclude by saying that I am not going on an excursion; I am concentrating on the statement which the Leader of the Government read into the record as being the policy of the Government of Canada on Libyan terrorism today. I think I am entitled to ask what is meant by that statement of official government policy. I think it will be examined very carefully to determine what was meant by the Prime Minister when he used the words "the root political problem", and that that political problem has to be resolved.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he can tell us what the official view of the Government of Canada is as to the "root political problem". I do not want any imaginary, speculative answers. I just want what is meant by this statement which was read into the record, and which was issued and uttered today by the Prime Minister.

Senator Roblin: Obviously, the statement cannot be limited to Libya only; it relates to terrorism and the Khadafy variety is but one. However, terrorism is not limited to that. There is the Red Brigade in West Germany, which is left-wing terrorism, and there is right-wing terrorism in parts of South America. Terrorism is a widespread phenomenon in the world today. The Prime Minister's statement surely is not limited to terrorism originating in Libya only.

If my honourable friend wants a definition of what the root causes of terrorism are, I will see what I can do for him.

Senator MacEachen: I think the Leader of the Government is being a little unfair—

Senator Frith: Or he does not understand. Maybe he just does not understand.

Senator MacEachen: —because this is a statement made by the Prime Minister on the Libyan crisis, not on terrorism in general. He is talking about Libya, about the attack by the United States on Libya, and he is concerned about the cycle of violence continuing, and that it will continue unless the root political problem is resolved. I think he is clearly talking about that situation. I should like some clarification about Libya, which is the object of the Prime Minister's statement, not the Red Brigade.

Senator Roblin: I will try to obtain a statement, but I disagree with him when he says that the concept of terrorism in that statement is limited to Libya. Libya is its focus, to be sure, but it is not limited to Libya.

Senator MacEachen: I ask any honourable senator to read the statement; there is no mistaking the fact that this is directed to Libya and Libya alone, and terrorism as an emanation of Libyan action.

Senator Roblin: I just do not agree with my friend. I can read it as well as he can.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government has contradicted himself again. He is now saying that it deals with terrorism in general; a moment ago he agreed that the root political problem, as it related to Libya, was the Arab-Israeli conflict. He cannot have it both ways.

The honourable Leader of the Government should watch his own words because he is contradicting himself. This is the second time in one Question Period that that has happened. I do not think that verbal footwork is the answer to these problems; it is a clear enunciation of what the government policy is, and once we get that, we can deal with it.

Does the Prime Minister believe that the actions of Khadafy are an offshoot of the Arab-Israeli conflict? Because that is what the statement says.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend keeps insisting that this relates to the Libyan situation only. That is not what the Prime Minister said. Why does he not read the whole thing. I will read it for him. It states:

Canada considers that terrorism cannot permanently be eradicated without resolving the root political problems—
It is "problems". It is the plural. You told us it was "problem", singular.

Senator MacEachen: My text is—

Senator Roblin: Well, your text is wrong; it is plural. It goes on to state:

—which give rise to it. We urge, therefore, a renewal of effort by all concerned to reach negotiated settlements to the tensions that have long plagued the Middle East.

That is clear enough.

Senator MacEachen: Of course it is clear that the terrorism is located in the Middle East.

The Leader of the Government has already said that, in his view, the root cause of it is the Arab-Israeli conflict, and that is why Khadafy is doing this. I do not accept that. I do not intend to wait for a resolution. I do not intend to wait, and the world should not wait, for the Arab-Israeli conflict to be settled and, in the meantime, give Khadafy a free ride. That is what you are saying.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend and his associates were in charge of the Government of Canada for many years, and I would like to know just what progress they made in settling this question that he will not wait for now. He waited when he was in office, but now that he is out of office he does not want to wait.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thought we would never get to this interesting part of our proceedings.

Senator Frith: If we get answers it will be interesting.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend sits there and mumbles into his chin, you know, and—

Senator Frith: I did not mumble; what I said was quite clear.

Senator Roblin: Then why not stand on your feet when you have something to say? I have to, so you should also.

Senator Frith: I will stand and say that it will, indeed, be interesting if we are finally getting some answers.

Senator Roblin: Now that we have had that enlightening statement from my friend, we can get on with the business. He has made a great contribution to the work of the Senate this afternoon.

The answers I have today are to questions asked by the Leader of the Opposition on March 13, regarding the budget paper sent to Canadian embassies, if he remembers that question.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): May I have that read, please?

● (1510)

Senator Roblin: Certainly.

THE BUDGET

VERSION OF BUDGET PAPER SENT TO CANADIAN EMBASSIES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, this is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 13 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding the Budget—Version of Budget Paper sent to Canadian Embassies.

With the release of the February 1986 Budget, a separate document entitled "The Canadian Budget in Perspective" was circulated to the Canadian embassies. This document provides a synopsis of information published in the "Budget Speech," "Budget Papers," "Fiscal Plan" and "Toward a Sustained Expansion" documents and is totally consistent with the information provided in these documents.

It should be noted that some of the charts in the two documents, while identical in all substantial respects, have different physical dimensions due to the varying formats of the documents.

Copies of the document are available and have been forwarded to honourable members of both houses.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—STATUS OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on March 13 last by the Honourable Senator MacEachen regarding Canada-United States Relations—Meeting between Prime Minister and President of the United States—Status of Document.

The document BACKGROUND PAPERS: The Washington Summit March 18-19, 1986 was prepared by the Department of External Affairs and the Prime Minister's Office and published under the authority of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It served, as its title suggests, as a background document for the press to supplement the oral briefing to the press prior to the Washington Summit between the Prime Minister and President Reagan.

The introductory section contains an overview of the government's approach and relationship to the United States of America. It also includes a review of the major events since September 1984. Naturally, this included reference to the major speech the Prime Minister gave in New York in December 1984. The sentence dealing with that speech is an accurate reflection of the Prime Minister's address where he said:

So these are the main reasons why my government is so committed to rebuilding Canada's image in the world:

- as a free, tolerant and independent nation;
- as a reliable trading partner;
- as a good place to invest and do business;
- as a people committed to the entrepreneurial spirit; and
- as a nation that honours its commitments to its allies.

The full text is available from the Department of External Affairs (Statements and Speeches No. 84/18, New Climate for Investment in Canada).

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

CENTRAL AMERICA—USE OF MILITARY FORCE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Now what about the one on Central America? Would you like that one read too?

Senator MacEachen: Please.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, this is in response to a question asked by the honourable Leader of the Opposition on March 18, 1986, regarding Foreign Affairs—Central America—Use of Military Force—Government Policy.

At the recent summit meeting in Washington between Prime Minister Mulroney and President Reagan, the situation in Central America was discussed. The Prime Minister raised with the President, Secretary Shultz and others, the Government of Canada's position on the nature of the crisis in Central America and the appropriate means of pursuing a solution. Canada's view is that the region's basic problems are social and economic in origin and the solution similarly must be social and economic, not military. Canada has acted in a concrete manner by increasing our development assistance to Central America, and we have played a constructive role in supporting the Contadora process, not only through public statements but also in providing expertise on control and verification mechanisms of a peace agreement.

With respect to the military situation in Central America, the Canadian government is not in favour of any third party intervention in Central America and has publicly regretted the extension to Central America of East/West confrontation and the related militarization of the area. Canada does not approve of the supply of armaments by any country to opposing factions in Central America. That position has been expressed on a number of occasions to the United States government, to the various Central American governments and to others such as Cuba. The government has emphasized that Canada believes strongly that the countries of Central America must be free to seek their own solution without interference from any source.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): With respect to the answer on Central America, while it is true that—as I heard the answer—Canada has expressed the view in various places that it is not in favour of military intervention, it is not stated in the answer that the Prime Minister conveyed this opinion directly to the President. Am I missing something, or is that contained in the answer?

Senator Roblin: I think the Prime Minister expressed our position clearly to the President.

Senator MacEachen: But am I correct in saying that the answer that has been provided does not contain the information that the Prime Minister conveyed that view directly to the President?

Senator Roblin: I do not think that is correct. The Prime Minister raised Canada's position with the President, and that includes the things I have mentioned.

Senator MacEachen: Oh, so the leader tells us that it includes it, but the answer does not say so.

Senator Roblin: It does say so. It says, "The Prime Minister discussed Canada's position." I have read what Canada's position is and that is the position that was conveyed to the President. I do not see how there could be any doubt about it.

Senator MacEachen: That is not contained in your answer.

Senator Roblin: It certainly is.

Senator MacEachen: In the written answer?

Senator Roblin: When my friend has a chance to read it, perhaps he will be better satisfied.

Senator MacEachen: I have listened to it and that is it.

Senator Roblin: There is one more answer. This is in response to a question by Senator Olson. He is not here. I will not read it unless someone asks me to.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—U.S. AGRICULTURE POLICY AS AGENDA ITEM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have a delayed answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 18 and 20, 1986, by the Hon. Hazen Argue, and on March 19, 1986 by the Hon. H.A. Olson, regarding Meeting between Prime Minister and President of United States—U.S. Agriculture Policy as an Agenda Item.

(The answer follows:)

Canadian concerns over certain provisions of the 1985 U.S. Food Security Act (Farm Bill) were raised by the Prime Minister during discussions with President Reagan, Secretary of State Shultz, Secretary of Agriculture Lyng, U.S. Trade Representative Yeutter and with the leadership of the Senate. Prime Minister Mulroney noted the problems affecting farmers on both sides of the border, indicating that the recently announced reduction in the 1986 loan rate for wheat and other crops receiving price support would only worsen the current situation of low world prices for these commodities. He also pointed out Canadian concerns about the high level of agricultural export subsidies contained in the legislation and about possible restrictions on the movement of Canadian livestock products to the United States. The Prime Minister asked for U.S. understanding and cooperation regarding Canada's desire to ensure that conditions in the international trading environment did not further deteriorate. The U.S. response in the discussions was to observe that many of the export programs were aimed at the European Community and not at Canada, but that Canadian concerns would be noted and all possible done to not harm friendly trading nations such as Canada. The United States and Canada share many objectives in regard to the upcoming multilateral trade negotiations in the GATT and both countries are looking for an improved set of rules and procedures for trade in agricultural products.

REQUESTS FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government still has not come up with an answer to my question No. 17 dated October 16 about the Deschênes Commission. Could the leader tell us how long it will take to get this answer?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will make inquiries, honourable senators.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I may have missed the occasion on which the Leader of the Government answered a question I posed more than a year ago as to whether Mr. Ed Broadbent, Leader of the New Democratic Party, had been invited to the gala following Shamrock Summit No. 1.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will endeavour to find an answer to that stimulating question.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, you will notice that Senator Nurgitz is not in the chamber at the moment. I think he is engaged with one of his committees. However, he asked me to clarify the position I have on this order, which he is interested in. I told him what my position is and that I propose to put it on the record today. He agreed that I should do so, even though he is not here.

There are three points I want to make. The first is that I generally support the idea of our Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments, namely the activity of the committee in attempting to, perhaps, broaden and increase its authority on a pattern based on the authority that its counterpart has in Australia. In essence, that power in Australia is a power to disallow, in effect, certain statutory instruments or regulations, or what is called subordinate legislation. Now whether we want to go that far or not I do not know, but Senator Godfrey and others have told us that the committee in Australia is powerful, effective, and produces desirable results because of the power it has in this very important field of subordinate legislation—that is legislation that is, in effect, passed by regulation and by bureaucrats and departments rather than by Parliament.

That having been established, the question is: Does this committee need to travel to Australia to get the information, or can it get the information here?

● (1520)

I know it is difficult to define the advantages that may be derived from these meetings as distinct from simply reading documents. I want Senator Nurgitz to know that I—as, I hope, are other senators—am open to persuasion, so I think we ought to hear something about the advantage of the proposed trip to Australia as opposed to a reading of documents. I should like to hear the persuading arguments, and I believe Senator Nurgitz should put them on the record.

The third and final point I wish to make is that there are expenses involved in such a trip and our share, I take it, will be one third of the total. We do not know what those figures are, and I think, in compliance with both the spirit and the letter of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders which was adopted at our last sitting, we should have that information. I believe that information should then be considered by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration so that when we come to vote on the motion all three points will have been satisfied. To reiterate, honourable senators, my first point concerns the general principle of the advantage of informing ourselves on the powers, authorities and activities of the Australian counterpart committee; my second is to ask why it cannot be obtained simply by a reading of documents; and my third point is; how much is it going to cost?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to clear up one other matter. Is it true that the members of this committee travelled to Australia previously, that being about one or two years ago?

Sensor Frith: I do not know the answer to that. This is not my motion.

Sensor Doody: It was not that committee.

Sensor Frith: I do not know the answer to the question, but I do not think that is the case.

Sensor Roblin: Some of us did travel, and we learned something.

Sensor Frith: Yes, some of us did, but we were not members of that committee, and the trip was not made in connection with this subject matter. However, I agree that we did learn something about this subject also on that trip, and that was the basis of my first point.

I think this is exactly the kind of question that Senator Nurgitz wants to see on the record, and I am sure he will deal with it when he speaks to the motion.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, and the document entitled: "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): As I understand it, Order No. 10 deals with the power of a subcommittee of the committee chaired by Senator Tremblay to take certain evidence; is that correct?

[Translation]

Does Order No. 10 deal with the power to travel to take evidence from the subcommittee of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology? Is that the raison d'être of Order No. 10?

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Yes.

Senator Frith: If I understand correctly, there were two problems in principle: First, the question as to whether such a committee can travel with only one member to take evidence; second, it was thought the cost of travel should be established in advance.

In that sense, this question was related to the seventh report of the Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments. As I see it, I think we can refer the matter to the committee or leave things as they are. In the meantime, am I right to suggest that, in any event, both problems must be submitted to the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration?

Senator Tremblay: I understand the situation the same way as Senator Frith does. Indeed, according to the new rules adopted last March 26, the next step is to appear before the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

Once that committee has submitted its report on the request referred to in the new rules, we will come back to the Senate to study these new rules.

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I want to be quite clear that I understand this distinction, because I had a conversation with the Deputy Leader of the Opposition on this subject. As I understood the matter as it developed, there were a couple of points to which my honourable friend has referred that were causing trouble for me, at any rate. The idea was that we would let the argument take place before the committee without committing ourselves in advance through the form of this resolution, one way or the other. I am curious to know how we intend to do that.

My thought was that we would informally, if in no other way, put the matter before the committee before dealing with it in this chamber. If that is the understanding, I am agreeable to it.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, perhaps I should look at the report again, but, as I recall it, it is my understanding that the order will stand, that it will not be referred as an order to the committee and that we are not asked, and we ought not—in fact, under the amendment, as I understand it, we cannot and must not—pass such a motion until we have a report from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration so that when we make the decision, we make it knowing the costs.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the chairman of this committee whether this motion has been approved by the committee or whether it reflects the personal initiative of Senator Gigantès.

Senator Tremblay: It has been approved by the committee.

We were waiting for the new rules, as contained in the report presented by Senator Molgat and which were adopted on March 26, before proceeding to the Internal Economy Committee to have the budget which was approved by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, approved or modified. That is my understanding of my reading of the new rules. Perhaps I am no exception in trying through experience to learn the exact meaning of the new rules.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, if I am wrong, I hope someone will correct me, but I do not think I could have proceeded on the basis of a personal initiative as a subcommittee chairman without the approval of the full committee. I do not really understand the question by Senator Haidasz. It was not addressed to me, but, as I understand the rules of the Senate, what he has suggested is not possible.

Senator Doody: I presume this order will stand in the name of Senator Marshall who will be with us on Thursday. He is presently in Charlottetown in connection with veterans' affairs.

Senator Frith: He will then have had an opportunity to read these edifying remarks.

Senator Doody: It will be something for him to look forward to.

Order stands.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday I addressed a number of questions to the Leader of the Government with respect to the serious situation which prevails in the Middle East as a result of the action taken by the United States in directing attacks on military targets and installations in Libya in retaliation for acts of terrorism.

The Leader of the Government undertook to provide information on these points, and I wonder if he is in a position to give me that information today.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not have specific replies to all the points raised by my honourable friend, but some of them were covered last night in the speech made by the Minister of National Defence in the other place. The items covered in his speech that caught my eye had to do with consultation with allies. In his remarks the minister in the other place stated that France, Italy, the United Kingdom and the Federal Republic of Germany had been consulted since the beginning of this crisis. That particular question, I think, is disposed of in that way.

From a hurried glance at his speech I am not entirely sure that he did not answer other questions, but if he did I have not noted them. I will have to content myself with giving a more considered reply when I am able to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I want to register my own disappointment that the Leader of the Government has not taken advantage of the 24 hours that were available to him to inform himself on very relevant information that is necessary for senators if they are to participate effectively in the affairs of this country. I do not know what recourse one has in circumstances of this kind. Yesterday I addressed a series of questions to the Leader of the Government, and he has referred to one snippet of information that was contained in a speech made by the Deputy Prime Minister in the other chamber.

I want to tell the Leader of the Government in the most serious way that we on this side of the house find his attitude quite unsatisfactory. Yesterday I asked the Leader of the Government if he would reconsider his position and he has come back into the house and shown even greater contempt for all of us than he did yesterday, because he did not even take the opportunity of that 24 hours to inform himself on matters that would have been easily available to him if he had taken various simple steps.

Senator Roblin: I want to assure my honourable friend that I have been doing my best and that I will get the answers for him. But I think he would agree with me that on matters as important and serious as this he deserves and he will get a considered statement in reply to the points he raises. I have asked my colleagues who are responsible for these matters to give me information in writing so that I can provide it to my honourable friend in a complete and accurate manner. That is what I intend to do.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, that is not a satisfactory answer. It is unsatisfactory—

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Are you raising a point of order?

Senator Olson: Yes, I am. I am raising a point of order, a question of privilege or whichever you like. This affects the privileges of every member of this chamber.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn has given his permission to proceed.

Senator Olson: I want to say to Senator Flynn and to Senator Roblin that, notwithstanding these interventions of Senator Flynn, at least he tried, when he was Leader of the Government in this chamber in 1979, to answer some of the questions that were put to him. That, I suggest, is not the case now.

The question we must address when we are talking about the privileges of the members of this house is whether the complaint that has been raised by the Leader of the Opposition is really the fault of the government, the fault of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, or the general attitude of the government towards providing information to this house. It is important that we know the answer to that question. The Leader of the Government has just said that he did not have the information in writing that he could bring into this chamber. Therefore, I suppose that he is relying on what was printed in Hansard from the speech of the Minister of National Defence for his reply.

Surely the Leader of the Government and all honourable senators have the right to expect a little more than that. If he did what he said he did—which was that, following Question Period yesterday, he made inquiries of other members of the government, perhaps of the Prime Minister but certainly of the offices of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence—why did they not give him a reply in writing to the very specific questions that were raised yesterday? Those queries were completed before 3.30. I know, and so does Senator Flynn, that when those kinds of requests are made something usually comes back in a timely manner.

Senator Flynn: That is not necessarily true.

Senator Olson: Oh, it is not true—well, if that is the general attitude of the Conservatives towards supplying information, that is worth knowing.

Senator Flynn: You are talking through your hat.

Senator Olson: I am not talking through my hat—in fact, it was even better than that. Every day, people in the office of the Leader of the Government and, indeed, in the departments, would at least try to anticipate what the questions would be. Senator Flynn knows about this.

Senator Flynn: I know about you, too!

Senator Olson: They would provide explanations based on an anticipation of questions. For the Leader of the Government to suggest that it could not be anticipated that there would be some questions asked yesterday about the military strike at Libya is, of course, ludicrous. He knows very well that any people charged with that responsibility would have put that question at the top of the list. Yet there is still no solid information from any of the government offices, except by way of the speech of the Minister of National Defence. The Leader of the Government in the Senate had nothing in writing that he could bring into this chamber to respond to the questions of the Leader of the Opposition. But, honourable senators, it is more serious than simply this one incident, because over the past few months we have been asking the Leader of the Government for information on a number of government policies. Some of them relate to extremely severe economic conditions in certain geographic and economic sectors of the country, and the answer is almost always the same: They have a watching brief. They are sitting back, watching the situation. He then goes on to say that because he is a minister without portfolio, he is unable and therefore not obliged to provide information on those questions. I wish to say to him that that is completely unacceptable and it is not in keeping with the accepted traditions—

● (1405)

Senator Flynn: It is accepted—

Senator Olson: —or the accepted practice of this house.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On a point of privilege, it is not acceptable to him, and nor is it acceptable to some others, from whom you will hear one at a time.

Senator Flynn: He is making a speech.

Senator Frith: Let us hear from one at a time.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn is using the same old tactics he has used for the past 20 years—that is, he thinks that he can bulldoze people off the track on the floor of this chamber. Well, let him go ahead, but he is not getting away with it today, because we have a legitimate grievance against the performance and what has been an accepted practice in this chamber, that the Leader of the Government, either provides the information—

Senator Flynn: Or he does not.

Senator Olson: —or he gives an undertaking that he will get it. That has been the tradition—not that he does not. That is unacceptable. What is worse, on many occasions the Leader of the Government has, in fact, given an undertaking that he is going to bring in information that is being sought, and nothing happens for weeks or for months. I say that it is an infringement of the privileges and rights of this house, and that the government should be accountable in this chamber during Question Period. I think the government needs to take that seriously and adopt a different attitude toward its obligations to the traditions that have existed here.

Senator Flynn: Nice lecture.

Senator Frith: Thank you.

Senator Olson: If that is all that it means to Senator Flynn—

Senator Flynn: You are lucky that it at least means that.

Senator Olson: In the last few hours we have had an outstanding example of what I am trying to persuade the Leader of the Government has been happening for a number of months. It is a very significant change in the practice of this house, and it is unacceptable; and it does, in fact, affect the privileges of the members of this house, because if we cannot ask him for information that the government has available to it, and have it delivered to the floor of this chamber in response to those questions, then I believe it does affect the privileges of the members of this house, and he should give us an undertaking that it is going to be changed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if I were guilty of the charges levelled by my honourable friend, I would indeed be embarrassed. But the fact is that it is not the case. I should start out, by way of reply, by telling him that I have never said in this house that because I am a minister without portfolio I will not produce the answers. I have never said that.

Senator Olson: You said it yesterday.

Senator Roblin: I did not. I said that I could not answer on the spot, because it was not a matter within my knowledge. But I have never refused to obtain information for which members have asked. Yesterday I gave the same undertaking, that I would obtain that information; and, if it makes my honourable friend feel any better, I can tell him that I have been on the telephone with some of my colleagues. I have not left it entirely to the ordinary processes by which these matters are dealt with. I have been on the telephone with some of my colleagues and I have told them of the desire of the Senate for this information, and have asked them to produce it for me as expeditiously as possible. That certainly will be done, and I will follow it through, as I have always done.

My honourable friend says that I come into this chamber without any preparation, that we do not try to anticipate questions. Well, now, how ridiculous can we get? I spend hours every day dealing with questions that might be raised. I come in, as I have this afternoon, armed with about 10 or 12 leading topics on which I expect that senators may wish to have some information. I do my best to see that I am armed with that information so that they can have it as soon as possible. Anybody who knows me knows that I would not be so contemptuous of the rights of senators or the dignity of this house to indulge in the kind of performance that my honourable friend has spoken about.

● (1410)

My honourable friend says that I say that we will hold a watching brief and then I do not produce the answers. That simply is a statement to the effect that the policy on the matter is not at the present time clarified. If the policy is not clarified, I cannot tell him anything. When the policy is clarified, I will tell him what I can. I say to my honourable friend that I—perhaps I should not use the word “resent” because I know the source from which the objection comes, and I guess I do not resent that—however, I can say to my honourable friend that his charges are without foundation, that, within the limits of my natural capacity, I do my best to answer questions in this house and that when I do not have the answers, I do my best to get them. When I know that the matter is of some urgency, as was the point raised by the Leader of the Opposition today, I do not just sit behind my desk. I get on the telephone to see what I can do to hurry things along. That is certainly the course I intend to follow. So it seems to me that the point of privilege that has been raised is not supported by the facts.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I rise to, I hope, clarify the concerns that we have. Senator Roblin said in the intervention he just made that he is doing his best. I think that that is what is worrying us, the fact that it is his best. I do not believe that it is his best. Let us take yesterday as the best of all examples. If, as the leader says, he comes in armed with answers, positions or information on anticipated questions, how could it be that he failed to anticipate any of the questions on the matter raised by the Leader of the Opposition yesterday? I would have thought that anyone would have been able to anticipate those questions. Perhaps he had an off day yesterday. I am sure that even the leader will admit that yesterday is a perfect example—

Senator Flynn: You are having an off day.

Senator Frith: —of obvious questions that would be asked and that anyone could have anticipated. I am sure the leader remembers that often when we were sitting on that side we gave answers that were unsatisfactory, and that there were delays that were unsatisfactory to you as the then opposition, in providing answers. I appreciate all that. I appreciate also the fact that the leader does not have a portfolio.

The leader will remember that we had, as did Senator Flynn when he was Leader of the Government, a big book which was prepared for us every day. That is specifically what Mr. Laurier did. He read the newspapers and listened to the radio in an attempt to get an idea of what questions might come up. Then he would phone the departments in advance for information, and often we had statements. I recall an exchange between Senator Flynn and me on a mutually interesting topic. He knew that the questions were alive, both here and in the other place, and he had information supplied by his officials on the matter.

Senator Flynn: Oh, pooh, pooh!

Senator Frith: Now, there is something. The pooh-pooher to end all pooh-poothers is now pooh-pooing himself. At least for this occasion he used good judgment in his target.

That is our concern. I say to the Honourable the Leader of the Government that I believe that he can do better in his preparations. Of course, he can do better in getting the answers more quickly, as we could have done better. There will always be dissatisfaction over the speed with which questions are answered, particularly with ones that are outdated or obsolete because the answer is not given in the same week. I hope that he will do better. We tried. We did not always succeed. It is understandable that in many cases the reply is, “I don’t have that answer. I shall try to get it.” However, in those cases it is often that the questions could not be easily anticipated. Yesterday was a prime example of questions that could easily be anticipated.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, let us take into account the time sequence with respect to some of the questions asked yesterday. They had to do with a meeting with the American envoy in Ottawa. If my information is correct, that meeting took place about lunch time yesterday.

Senator Frith: But you knew about it. We asked his name and you could not give us his name.

Senator Roblin: Certainly I knew about it because that information was made available to me. However, what happened at that meeting or the questions that might arise from it were completely beyond my ken.

Senator Frith: Why didn't you say to somebody, "I am going to be asked about it, so tell me about it"?

Senator Roblin: You can say that as much as you like, but when the time sequence does not allow for that sort of consideration to be given, it simply is not possible, so it seems to me that my honourable friend is really being a little bit unfair in saying to me that I do not do my job properly. I am sure I do it just as well as he ever did. I am quite prepared to stand my record up against his and I do not really think that says much for me but, insofar as that is an endorsement, I would certainly claim it.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on this question of privilege, I think there are two trends here. The first trend has to do with the criticism of the behaviour of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I think he has replied quite adequately, but I would say again that I think the way that Senator Olson and Senator Frith have been treating the Leader of the Government is very unfair in this instance. I think Senator Roblin has replied in a very mild way, but I will say it more brutally that I think he has been doing a much better job than any of his predecessors, including me, have ever done in regard to questions. That is the first point.

The second trend in this so-called question of privilege, which was really a pretence for making a speech and for talking about the situation without saying anything, because you really have nothing to say—

Senator Frith: Listen to the expert.

Senator Flynn: —is that the assumption seems to be that you are entitled to an immediate answer to any question that you put.

Senator Frith: Nobody has every said that.

Senator Flynn: First of all, you are not entitled to any answer.

Senator Frith: No one has suggested that we are entitled to an answer right away. That is ridiculous.

Senator Flynn: You are not entitled to any answer from the Leader of the Government. He has never done this, but he may very well say, if he wants to, "I choose not to answer that question." If he says that, that is his right and that is in conformity with the rules.

The second aspect of this second trend is the fact that we are now dealing with very sensitive questions. I think the opposition, and in particular the Leader of the Opposition, should be much more careful in dealing with the situation at hand. There are elements of fact in this situation that the Leader of the Government, or any member of the cabinet, is not in a position to divulge.

Senator Frith: He can tell us that, but he never took that position.

Senator Flynn: Very well—

Senator Frith: Are you taking that position for him? He never took that position for himself. Can he not handle it himself?

Senator Flynn: I am taking that position, not for him.

Senator Perrault: Senator Flynn is the defence counsel.

Senator Flynn: I like the intervention of Senator Perrault. I have missed engaging in a debate with him for a long time.

Senator Perrault: That will happen, one of these days.

Senator Flynn: We had more fun because he had more humour than the present Leader of the Opposition who very seldom smiles and tries to appear very serious when, in fact, he is not serious at all. As a former Secretary of State for External Affairs, he knows very well, I am sure, what I mean when I speak of sensitive information that cannot be divulged. He knows about that element and he knows that he will not get an answer. However, if his purpose is only to win a little debate or if he merely wants to make a noise, and if that is also the purpose of Senator Olson, that is all very well. In any event, any claim of a question of privilege is invalid on both counts.

Senator Frith: So, no change; no undertaking to do any better.

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): In light of what has been said, I want to direct a question to the Leader of the Government.

Against the test that has now been applied by Senator Flynn—namely, that one should not ask about sensitive matters—let me now ask about something that is not sensitive.

Will the Leader of the Government tell me what the attitude of the Government of Canada is toward the air strike by the United States against Libya? Is it in support of that air strike, or is it opposed?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): In his statement in the House of Commons yesterday, in which he outlined the government's position on that matter, the Minister of Defence rehearsed the circumstances that had led up to the American air strike in Libya. He laid before the House the fact that there had been continuous consultation with the United States government and other allies in respect of the matter, and he made the statement that the government had accepted the accuracy of the judgment of the American government that there had been a direct linkage between what the Libyans were doing and some of the terrorist activities of which we had knowledge.

After consideration of all these factors—and while the government deplores the fact that people die in these situations, and without ignoring the fact that a peaceful settlement of these matters is by far the best way to go, if you can possibly do that in the circumstances—the government supports the objectives of the United States.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that information. That was sought yesterday and not given.

We now know that the Government of Canada clearly supports the action taken by the United States, and that is new information. It is now clear that the Government of Canada, along with Britain, supports the United States, and that the action taken is opposed by the other 11 members of the European Community.

I now want to ask another question because in the answer the leader alluded to the fact that the Government of Canada had accepted the word of the United States that it had evidence to establish the linkage. I asked yesterday whether the evidence had been made available to the Deputy Prime Minister in that conversation.

The President, in his statement, said, "Our evidence is direct, it is precise, it is irrefutable." No member of the House of Commons, no member of the Senate, and no member of the public has had access to that evidence. We do not know what it is. I want to ask the leader whether the Americans made that evidence accessible to the Deputy Prime Minister, whether he examined it, and whether, on the basis of that examination, he satisfied himself that the linkage existed.

Senator Roblin: I believe that the answer is yes.

Senator MacEachen: That is another important answer. The Deputy Prime Minister has seen the evidence and, on the basis of its examination, accepted it as establishing a linkage.

That information was not given yesterday, because in the statement of the Prime Minister all that was said was that the Government of Canada accepted the word of the President of the United States. Now we know that the Government of Canada, on its own account, has examined the evidence and has found it convincing. Those are two important statements—that we have examined the evidence, and that we support the action of the United States.

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS WITH ALLIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): When did the consultations with our European allies to which the Leader of the Government referred a moment ago take place?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The statement of the government is that the communications with our European allies have been going on for some time, for several weeks. They have been continuous, as far as I am aware, since at least January 10, when we made our statement about economic sanctions with respect to Libya, which was also a matter of discussion between all parties concerned at that time.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I understand that, naturally, there would be ongoing discussions with the European allies and others. The question is: Following the information given to Canada by the United States of its intention to engage in this strike, were there consultations after that event with our European allies to determine what their views were?

Senator Roblin: I think that is the case, but I am going to check to be doubly sure, because I would not like to give my friend any inaccurate information.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I thank the Leader of the Government. I asked that question because almost within that time span the 12 ministers of the European Community were deliberating upon the matter. They had expressed their opposition to the action and I wanted to know whether, before Canada finally made up its mind, it consulted with the Europeans. The Leader of the Government has told me that he will now find out, and I thank him for that.

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—LEGALITY UNDER INTERNATIONAL LAW

Hon. Jack Austin: I would like to ask the Leader of the Government whether, in the same matter, when advice was received from the United States emissary and consultations took place, the government sought advice from its law officers on the question of the appropriateness of the action which the United States proposed to take in terms of international law; and, in addition, whether in the submissions of the United States emissary, any questions with respect to the legality under international law of the actions taken with respect to Libya were addressed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think that this question was decided on the basis of international law, it was decided on the basis of policy.

Senator Austin: Well, is the Leader of the Government saying that Canada has made a policy decision to accept an action which it knew was contrary to international law as expressed in United Nations pronouncements and other international law with respect to these measures?

Senator Roblin: I think that issue was debated yesterday in the United Nations. It seems to me that the action of the United States may be looked at as illegal, or it may be looked at as legal, depending on your point of view. I am sure there is no clear-cut definition of international law in this respect.

Senator Austin: But did I understand the Leader of the Government to say that the Government of Canada accepted the actions taken by the United States, although it was aware that it was possibly treating as a policy matter an action that was contrary to international law or in derogation of international law?

Senator Roblin: I have no information at all that this was in derogation of international law.

REPORTED INCIDENTS IN TRIPOLI

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. There have been widespread reports today that there has been some shooting in and around Tripoli. Has the Leader of the Government any information concerning what is happening in that city—whether there is a revolt in progress?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, I have no information about that at the present time. We have representatives in Tripoli, and I expect I will be able to report more when we hear from them.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POSITION ON UNITED STATES UNDERTAKINGS

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate concerning the free trade negotiations with the United States. The press reports that last Friday a majority of the members of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate made it clear that they would not approve the “fast-track” application, if I can put it that way, of the U.S. Administration for the trade negotiations with Canada.

I have read that the position of the Canadian government was that if the “fast-track” procedure was not approved we would then not proceed with the negotiations. Last night, on television, I saw Mr. Kelleher, the Minister for International Trade, being interviewed and I took his remarks to mean that, even if the Finance Committee of the United States Senate did not authorize the fast track, the Government of Canada would still hold the U.S. Administration to its undertaking to enter into these negotiations and that negotiations would go ahead in any event.

Could the Leader of the Government tell me which of those positions is the position of the government?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think my honourable friend has it straight. I do not think the Minister for International Trade said that we were going to proceed with these negotiations if the Senate turned us down, which is what my friend is talking about. I think the position of the government is that we are awaiting the decision of the United States Senate and it would be unwise at this moment to presume that they are not going to approve it. It may be tomorrow that they make their decision and it may not; it may be some other time. However, it is clearly the part of wisdom to wait until the decision is made.

If my honourable friend asks me whether we want to proceed with trade negotiations if we do not get the fast-track system, I would have to say that I think we will have to reconsider our position very carefully if that system is denied to us. Our view is that it would be very difficult to proceed under those circumstances.

Senator van Roggen: I might just say that I agree with the statement of the Leader of the Government much more than I agreed with the statement of the Minister for International

[Senator Bosa.]

Trade last night, as I understood it when I heard it on television.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

TAKEOVERS BY INDUSTRIAL CONGLOMERATES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question arises from leading topics; therefore, in view of what has been said by the Leader of the Government, I am sure he is armed with information.

My question has to do with the widely expressed concern regarding takeovers of financial institutions by industrial conglomerates. Can the leader enlighten us as to government policy in that regard?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): As you know, I do come armed with some information. I thought my honourable friend was going to ask me about interest rates being offered on Canadian bonds.

Senator Sinclair: I will do that after you answer the question I asked.

Senator Frith: Tell us what the answers are and we will give you the questions.

Senator Roblin: I will give you the answer concerning the bonds right now; after all, I have the information and I want to share it.

Long-term bonds were priced at 8.89 per cent. That refers to 20-year bonds, which is pretty good. I am sure my honourable friend wants to congratulate me on that because he has been raising Cain with me because he thinks interest rates are too high and are not going down. There is some good news, and I want to spread it.

In connection with the point he raised in the first instance, which has to do with, I suppose, the Imasco proposition, the senator is, I am sure, very well aware, that the government has introduced legislation which gives it the power to regulate certain aspects of transactions of the kind to which he refers. I think it has been made clear by previous government statements that that is retroactive to a certain date.

Under those circumstances, the government thinks it wise to examine the Imasco proposition to see whether it is on all fours with government policy. That examination is proceeding and we are in touch, I am told by my colleague, with the private interests concerned in order to find out exactly what they have in mind. That will be compared with government policy views in this matter, and a decision will be reached.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am most interested, as I am sure a lot of people would be, in that remark.

However, my question was: What is the policy of the government? I understand that discussions are under way, but I should like to know what is the policy of the government in regard to control by industrial conglomerates of financial institutions.

Senator Roblin: I am going to be very candid with my friend. That is a problem that has arisen at the same time as this particular issue. After all, there have been three or four takeovers of a similar nature in which non-financial institutions have taken over trust companies. This is not anything new, but it seems to have come to a climax with the development of this particular issue.

The government has to present its bill and it has to be approved by Parliament. When that is done, we will be able to give consideration to the matter of policy. I do not think it would be appropriate to try to deal with a question of policy until the bill becomes part of the law of the land.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I take it that the bill the Leader of the Government has referred to is Bill C-103. As I read that bill, it does not delineate policy; am I wrong about that?

Senator Roblin: The bill provides the basis on which policy is to be decided and, until the bill is passed, it is not part of the law of the country.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I now want to go back to the question of interest rates. I congratulate the Leader of the Government—if he wants this kind of congratulation—in that he has propped up interest rates on the backs of western Canadian farmers and the oil producers, and has driven them practically to distraction. Then he gets up and asks me to congratulate him for taking that kind of action and allowing farmers to go broke and allowing producers to go under.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my honourable friend were aware of the trends in farm interest rates as laid down by the federal Farm Credit Corporation, he would be aware that since this government came into office the rates have been reduced three times and they are now over three percentage points lower than they were when his friends were in office.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Sinclair: Of course, the problem with these kinds of answers is that real interest rates, which reflect the impact of interest, have never in the history of this country been as high as they are now.

Senator Roblin: The plain fact of the matter is that a reduction of three points in the interest rates over this period of time saves the farmers of the country tens of millions of dollars. Real or unreal, they are real dollars, so far as they are concerned, in their pockets. My honourable friend can make his point if he wants to, but the fact is that interest costs for western farmers have been going down.

Senator Sinclair: The only way you can pay interest rates is to have income, and income reflects prices. Prices come down and the whole of the economy comes down, and real interest rates go up, so the impact is greater, not less.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Roblin: What is my honourable friend trying to say? Is it that we organize the price of oil and that we organize the price of wheat? Of course, we do not; we struggle with them, but they are not products of our policy.

Senator Sinclair: The government did have something to say about the price of wheat and it did have something to say about the price of oil, but perhaps I am wrong about that.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, on the same line of questioning, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he would clearly and unambivalently inform this chamber whether the federal government is against any body, any corporation, owning more than ten per cent of any trust company, loan company or other financial institution in Canada to prevent this so-called "concentration of economic power" falling into a few hands.

Senator Argue: Only if it is a Canadian company.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have to tell my honourable friend that that very subject is under examination by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. If he attends that committee's meeting at 3.30 this afternoon, which is not a long time from now, he will find out what they think about ownership of Canadian trust companies. I am inclined to think that he will find their answers reassuring, because I certainly like them.

Senator Haidasz: I asked what was the federal government's policy regarding this matter of allowing more than ten per cent ownership in trust companies and loan companies.

Senator Roblin: I know my honourable friend said that, but he should be aware of the fact that there has been a green paper from the Minister of State in this matter; there has been a report from the House of Commons Finance and Economic Affairs Committee in respect of this matter; there is the expected report from the Senate committee in respect of this matter; and when all those have received due consideration, the policy of the government will be made clear, but it is not appropriate that we should rush into this when the subject is under investigation. We are going to have to take into account what legislators in this country think about it.

AGRICULTURE

WESTERN CANADA—DROUGHT CONDITIONS—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government if the government is aware that the drought conditions in much of southern Alberta and, indeed, in part of southern Saskatchewan are more severe this year than they have been in the two previous disaster years. This makes the third year in succession that such conditions have prevailed.

If so, has the government set in motion any machinery in the form of committees or whatever to assess that situation and, in co-operation with the provinces, to deal with it?

I ask that because, in the next few days, a large part of the livestock, which depends on the grass grown in the spring—which is not happening this year—is going to be faced with those circumstances.

● (1440)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think my honourable friend is a little pessimistic. There may be a drought in western Canada this year. I certainly hope not, but, as far as grain growers are concerned, it is a little too early to rush to that conclusion. We know perfectly well that seeding has not begun in most places, if any. In fact, we sometimes look for rains until the end of June to save our crops. Such situations have arisen on more than one occasion. I am not going to be that pessimistic.

There may be a problem with livestock. I will certainly bring this matter to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture and ask him whether there is anything under consideration at the present time. I do know that last year when we ran into these problems the government could be relied upon to provide some assistance to those who needed it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I agree with the reply of the minister in the first instance, that a grain crop cannot be lost before it is seeded; I understand that. But normally the moisture conditions in the soil indicate how much potential grass growth there is likely to be in the first two months or so of the season. That is usually what carries the livestock for the rest of the summer. The current indications are that that moisture is almost non-existent; furthermore, that there will be a very small hay crop because of this situation. I would like to know whether the government will try to make some plans now so as to deal with that problem, because with respect to that aspect of the livestock activity, it is fairly certain that we will be faced with a disastrous situation.

Senator Roblin: I am not prepared to accept that as a fact at the present time. I can assure my honourable friend, however, that if his dismal forecast comes to pass, the government will not sit inactive.

ANSWERS TO UNASKED QUESTIONS

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. He said earlier that he was prepared, after doing his homework assiduously, to deal with 10 or 12 topics of major importance during Question Period. He has already dealt with the interest on bonds and the Imasco proposition, as he called it. Without wanting to detract from the high drama and the sense of great suspense that we enjoy during Question Period each day, I wonder whether he could identify the other eight or ten topics he is prepared to deal with so that it could help us and, most assuredly, help him.

Senator Doody: He wants the answers before he asks the questions!

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I obviously made a great mistake in answering Senator Sinclair's question when he had not yet asked it. I will not make that mistake again.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE—INCREASED COST OF ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I doubt that my question will fall within the realm of the eight or ten that the government leader is prepared to answer, and I appreciate that he will take it as notice. It pertains to the administration of the Correctional Service of Canada and the government's stated policy of deficit reduction through restraint by curtailing expenditures. While we may disagree as to the programs and procedures of the government in that respect, I do not think we can disagree that, whatever measures are taken, they should be fair and equitable.

In that context, I ask the government leader why the Solicitor General authorized a 200 per cent increase in expenditures in the administration of the commissioner's office, which amount to $499,000 for the current fiscal year. While all sectors of the Canadian Correctional Service are curtailing and cutting expenditures, it is passing strange that the commissioner's office, the headquarters, should have that rather objectionable increase of 200 per cent of roughly half a million dollars.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Is my honourable friend correct in saying that the increase is 200 per cent for the head office of that organization? Perhaps he would be kind enough to send me the document and I will have a look at it. It comes as news to me. On the face of it, it requires an explanation.

Senator Hastings: By way of a supplementary question, for the year 1985-86, it was $256,000 with two people; in the year 1986-87, it will be $755,000 with three people.

Senator Roblin: I infer from that that those people are being paid approximately $150,000 per year apiece. I do find that strange.

Senator Sinclair: That is where Senator Flynn is going!

Senator Roblin: Senator Flynn? I thought it was Senator Hastings—he is the big man on prisons.

Senator Flynn: I don't know what I am doing in that picture.

IMMIGRATION

REFUGEE DETERMINATION—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, two weeks ago in Toronto there took place, in front of City Hall, a loud demonstration organized by the advocacy groups supporting refugees and relatives of refugees. They were protesting the government's delay in implementing Rabbi Gunther Plaut's recommendations on refugee determination, which were contained in a report he submitted to the government one year ago.

I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate when we can expect an overhaul of the Immigration Act and the government's response to Rabbi Plaut's report.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government is looking at this report very seriously, but that statement applies not only to the report. There are other problems in the entire field of immigration, particularly those having to do with refugees, which must be considered as part of the mix. These other questions are being assimilated to Rabbi Plaut's report in order to produce a reform of the situation which meets the obvious difficulties that we have run into. These difficulties are not of recent origin. They have been germinating and growing for many years and the situation is, in my view, quite unsatisfactory.

I think I am correct in saying that the government is at an advanced stage in its consideration of this matter. I know that the minister is anxious to get this matter before Parliament as soon as possible. It is not absolutely ready at the present time, but it is at an advanced stage of preparation.

MULTICULTURALISM

GOVERNMENT POLICY—DELAYED ANSWER

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I also want to say to Senator Haidasz, while I am on my feet, that I am able to provide an answer to the question he asked yesterday about the multicultural situation. While I cannot really claim that I have been able to provide this answer within the 24-hour period that some senators would like to allow me with respect to these matters, I can say that the new business orientation about which the minister spoke is intended to complement and not to replace the programs we now have. What that means in terms of dollars is not entirely clear at the present time, but the intention is to add something and not to take something away. Further than that, the minister intends to have consultation with all major sectors which depend on funding from Multiculturalism Canada before these measures are put into effect. I presume that that will be an adequate form of consultation with those people who are directly concerned.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—PLIGHT OF PRODUCERS—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS AND TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate and is one that I am sure he has on his list of possible questions. He, along with all honourable senators, is well aware of the crisis in agriculture and the situation that faces farmers and producers of grain across the country.

My question involves the recent announcement of a 19 per cent decrease in initial payments for grain. In light of market problems facing grain producers, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate indicate what is being done to alleviate the situation? I am well aware of the $580 million payment recently announced from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. I believe that Senator Argue raised that matter yesterday. This payment will be of great benefit to many farmers, but I would like to know if the government has any plans for deficiency payments so that farmers will be able to at least attempt to recover their cost of production, which is not possible at the present time.

Secondly, I should like to know if serious consideration has been given to improving the two-price system for wheat. This is of great assistance to farmers who produce that product. The president of the Canadian Consumers Association has recently announced that she favours an increase in the two-price system; that is, the payment for grain sold in Canada, which, although it would raise the price of bread in Canada by some few cents a loaf, would be a great help to those farmers who otherwise face a grim future. I would ask the government leader to indicate to us what the plans might be and to give an up-date on what the government really intends to do to help alleviate this grim situation.

● (1450)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree entirely with my friend's analysis of the situation. It is a very difficult one, and it is going to cause serious problems probably for longer than we would like to think. But when one considers that the price of wheat is caught between the European Economic Community, on the one side, which is pouring some 18 million tonnes of grains into the world system these days, when formerly they were importers, and at highly subsidized prices—I suppose they are selling it at $3 and paying their farmers $10, something of that order—and when one considers that in the United States they have allocated $50 billion over the next three years to support the price of wheat for their farmers—they will probably get $3 for it and pay their farmers $6, something of that order—

Senator Argue: In our money!

Senator Roblin: Yes, in our money. When one considers the success that some of the nations have had—on the one hand it is a blessing, and on the other it is a difficulty—in producing grain themselves, one can see that this problem will be very difficult to resolve. When we compare it to the straitened circumstances of the federal government, in terms of its financial resources, the difficulty of the situation is compounded.

It has not prevented us, however, from doing some things. For example, well over $1 billion, almost $1.1 billion, has been provided for western farmers within the past six months from the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. Last year there were multimillion-dollar payments with respect to drought and cattle. There are multimillion-dollar contributions toward crop insurance. We know also that subsidies are being provided to farmers through the Crow Rate Make-up Fund and matters of that sort. So very large sums of government money are being made available entirely properly and appropriately for the agricultural interests in this country; and that kind of support will continue.

I would like to think that that is going to solve all of our problems, but I do not think it is. We are still going to have serious problems of income and cash flow in western Canada, even with that help. We must consider seriously the suggestions that are made to do more.

One that I believe is likely to come to pass has to do with the two-price system for wheat—one price for export wheat and one price for wheat for domestic consumption. A committee of the other place, I believe, is now on its way to western Canada and elsewhere, including the cities, to discuss this matter with the people of Canada, in the expectation that there will be approval—as my honourable friend hinted there might be—from the Consumers Association for an increase in the domestic price of wheat—which might add, who knows, perhaps as much as 30 cents, 40 cents or 50 cents per bushel for those sales. That is entirely unknown at the moment.

The great secret, of course, will be to make sure that the pricing mechanism which transfers these domestic wheat prices to the price of bread is so structured that we do not ask the consumers to pay a mark-up on that increase in the price of wheat—and it will take some doing to achieve that goal. But it seems to me that a two-price policy is an important one, and there is good reason to think that the people of Canada will be willing to pay more; but they will also want some assurance that the extra price they pay will go to the farmer, and to the farmer only—and, as I say, that is going to be part of the problem.

So, as I say, there is a committee of parliamentarians that is now moving across the country, or will be very shortly, to deal with that very problem, and we will be able to report progress as it takes place.

Deficiency payments are probably a very important consideration, and probably one of the better ways of helping people in the farming community, and this is a policy which is going to have to be looked at by the government. I regret that I cannot say more about that at the present time, but I know that as the situation develops, and as the details of our problem become clearer, we will have to come up with solutions which so far have not been adopted or, indeed, advised to the public.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—IDENTIFICATION OF SPECIAL ENVOY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, just to complete the questioning on the earlier subject, and possibly leading to a further question tomorrow, can the Leader of the Government now identify the name of the special envoy who came to Ottawa yesterday, and his position?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will ask my colleagues whether that information is available, but I do not guarantee that it will be.

Senator MacEachen: May I bring it to the mind of the Leader of the Government that the identity of the special envoy who was sent to Europe has been made known. In fact, he has held press conferences all over the place saying what happened, after his meetings. He is the chief delegate of the United States to the United Nations. I hope that a veil of secrecy will not be drawn over the Canadian discussions when they have been made public elsewhere.

Senator Roblin: That is a reasonable observation.

AGRICULTURE

TWO-PRICE SYSTEM FOR WHEAT—POSSIBLE INFLUX OF SUBSIDIZED AMERICAN BAKERY PRODUCTS

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question arising from the statement concerning the two-tier price of wheat and the concern expressed by the Leader of the Government about passing on mark-ups. I trust that while he is addressing that question, he will also address the question of making certain that American bakeries would not attack Canadian bakeries with their subsidized products.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): That is one of the topics that will be reviewed by the committee of the other place.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—ORDER STANDS
 On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the third reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons",

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1. Strike out paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 2(2) and substitute the following:

"(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption, or

(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood."

2. Strike out subclauses 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void."—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I have not personally spoken to Senator Neiman, but I understand that both Senator Stanbury and Senator Nurgitz did so prior to the Easter recess. She has said that she has no objection to my amendments to Bill S-2 as reported by the committee. My understanding is that there is general agreement on the amendments I have proposed. There is some reluctance—even I was reluctant—with regard to adding the prohibition of marriage between adopted fathers and mothers and adopted sons and daughters. But I thought it was a reasonable compromise to the recommendation made by the committee.

If the question were put and carried, the bill could receive third reading now and be sent to the other place. Senator Neiman was wondering as to the position of the government. So far as I can ascertain, there is no objection to the bill as it would stand with the amendments. I do not know whether the bill would be adopted by the government as its policy or whether it would be sponsored by a private member on the other side. That has to be decided by the other House. So far as we are concerned, since this matter has now been studied very thoroughly by the committee for about two years, I believe we are in a position to make a decision and let the other place decide whether or not they want the bill. If it does, and if the bill passes the other place that would resolve the problem of those private bills that have been coming to us. Many people are waiting to see what we are going to do about that. If the bill passes, we will not need to consider any private bills; otherwise, there are several people waiting to present petitions in connection with private bills dealing with problems covered by this bill regarding prohibition of marriage between related persons.

If my assumptions are not contested, I would suggest that the amendment could be put. If it is carried, perhaps we could have third reading and terminate the matter as far as we are concerned.

• (1500)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I agree with most of what Senator Flynn has said. Certainly, we ought to let this bill get back on track and get moving, because it is designed to relieve the very undesirable situation described by Senator Flynn, and that has persisted for many years. I understand that some senators have reservations about the amendment, although I do not believe that any of them are on the committee. In any event, I have heard from some of them. There were some who did not seem to understand that the amendment would mean, for example—if I am correct, and I am sure that Senator Flynn will tell me if I am wrong—that an adopted son and an adopted daughter of the same family, who are not genetically related, could marry. I understand that some honourable senators have said that they wondered about that point.

We have to deal with the matter. My suggestion is a slight modification of what Senator Flynn is suggesting. It is that we let the order stand for a day, or, at most, until next week and that we do not wait for the three or four weeks that it might otherwise take to get the bill passed. As long as honourable senators know exactly what it is that they are voting on—and I found that some did not, but that does not mean that those to whom I explained the situation were opposed to it—we should deal with it either tomorrow or next Tuesday.

Senator Flynn: I have no objection to that course of action. I know, for example, that Senator Hicks was not happy with the amendment with regard to the prohibition of marriage between an adopted child and an adoptive parent. However, as far as adopted brothers and sisters are concerned there is presently no prohibition. I doubt that anybody would be worried about that point. I realize that the report of the committee suggested that we add this prohibition. The amendment would remove that prohibition and retain the other provision by way of a compromise, if you will, because the case will be very rare indeed where the adoptive father or mother would want to marry an adopted child.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I agree. I think that the more we say about the matter, the better, so that people who read Hansard will understand what it is they are voting on. It is, of course, possible that the question may be raised in the House of Commons when the bill gets there, as Senator Flynn has implied. Subject to allowing an extra couple of days to make sure that everyone understands what it is we are doing, I agree that we should proceed to deal with the bill.

Order stands.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1986-87

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), moved the second reading of Bill C-99, to provide borrowing authority.

He said: Honourable senators, Bill C-99 contains the standard authority to borrow. It is not, as Senator Frith has often explained at length, actually a commitment to borrow, although I used to always tell him that chances are that the government will probably take advantage of its authority.

Senator Frith: It has frequently worked out that way.

Senator Doody: That has been the historic precedent, yes.

Honourable senators are aware that the government can only permanently increase its outstanding debt by obtaining statutory borrowing authority from Parliament. Part IV, section 36 of the Financial Administration Act states that, "no money shall be borrowed or security issued by or on behalf of Her Majesty without the authority of Parliament." This clause refers only to the raising of new funds since the refinancing of existing debt is authorized by section 38 of the act.

In the recent budget presented by the Minister of Finance, the government's budget deficit for 1986-87 is estimated at $29.5 billion. Taking into account non-budgetary receipts of $6.9 billion, the government's financial requirements for 1986-87 are $22.6 billion. Therefore, clause 2 of this bill seeks $22.6 billion of borrowing authority for the present fiscal year, an amount exactly equal to the forecast financial requirements for the fiscal year. The government is not requesting any additional borrowing authority for fiscal 1986-87.

A new borrowing authority bill would normally include an amount equivalent to the financial requirements and a specified amount for contingencies such as possible foreign exchange requirements. This year, however, the government has recourse to $2 billion of unused, non-lapsing authority which was provided by Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 (No.2). Thus no contingency amount is required.

To remain consistent from one year to the next, clause 3 of the bill states that any unused borrowing authority granted by this bill or by Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 (No. 2), to the extent that the unused authority exceeds $2 billion, will be cancelled on March 31, 1987. Thus, similar to previous years, this clause preserves a $2 billion non-lapsing reserve, if it is available, to be carried forward into the 1987-88 fiscal year but does not permit any of the $2 billion reserve granted by Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85, (No. 2) to be carried beyond the current fiscal year.

This cancellation of old borrowing authority is in keeping with the desire of senators expressed earlier during the examination of previous borrowing authority bills. At that time some honourable senators suggested that any unused, non-lapsing reserve authority be periodically cancelled. The government would therefore be required to return to Parliament from time to time to obtain new reserve authority. The government recognizes this concern and that is why clause 3 provides for the cancellation of the $2 billion reserve granted by Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85, (No. 2) at the end of this fiscal year.

As you know, in May 1985, the Minister of Finance tabled a paper proposing improvements to the Canadian budgetary process. One of the suggestions in that paper was to seek Parliamentary approval of borrowing authority for the upcoming fiscal year at the same time as the budget was presented. The logic behind this proposal was that the budget presentation in February would set out all the financial information for the new fiscal year for Parliament to study. This is the course of action the government is following now, and I hope that debate on the budget and the fiscal stance presented by the government will be helpful in the examination of the Borrowing Authority Bill.

For the information of honourable senators, I would now like to outline how the government utilized the borrowing authority granted by Parliament for the 1985-86 fiscal year. The total amount of authority provided was $32.2 billion and it consisted of $12 billion provided by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1985-86; $18.2 billion provided by the Borrowing Authority Act, 1985-86, (No. 2), and a $2 billion reserve carried forward from the Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85, (No. 2).

[Senator Doody.]

During the 1985-86 fiscal year domestic borrowing operations used $24.3 billion of borrowing authority—$9.9 billion through the issue of Treasury Bills, $11.5 billion through the sale of marketable bonds and $2.9 billion through the net sale of Canada Savings Bonds.

There was in addition foreign borrowing that added $5.8 billion to the use of borrowing authority. The foreign borrowing represented a $900 million U.S. public issue in the U.S. market in July, a $500 million bond issue in the Eurodollar market in November 1985, an 80 billion yen bank loan in November 1985, an 80 billion yen public bond issue in the Euro-yen market in February 1986 and a U.S. $1 billion bond issue in the Eurodollar market in February 1986. In addition, net standby drawings during the 1985-86 fiscal year used about $2.2 billion of borrowing authority. There was also a redemption of a U.S. $250 million public issue in October which reduced the total use of borrowing authority. The borrowing authority calculations reflect as well the repayment of portions of Canadair Financial Corporation debt that was assumed by the government in the 1985-86 fiscal year. In total, about $30.2 billion of borrowing authority was used during the 1985-86 fiscal year and $2.0 billion was carried forward into this fiscal year.

● (1510)

In conclusion, I ask for your support of this bill on second reading. Financial requirements are always seasonally heavy at the beginning of every fiscal year and the limited amount of borrowing authority carried forward into this fiscal year will be used up very quickly and the government will soon have to resort to running down its cash balances.

I understand that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance is prepared to meet on Monday evening to consider this bill should it receive second reading in this chamber.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, would the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate deal with a question?

Senator Doody: I can certainly try, Senator Stewart, but it is very dry going.

Senator Stewart: It is not a very difficult question.

Senator Doody: In that case, I can probably handle it.

Senator Stewart: As the honourable gentleman has said, clause 3 provides that $2 billion of the borrowing authority would be non-lapsing. I understood him to say that the amount of borrowing authority sought by the bill is the same as the amount that the Minister of Finance calculated as the requirement of the government for the current fiscal year. My problem is this: If the bill provides only for what the Minister of Finance believes will be required in the current fiscal year, where is the $2 billion in the non-lapsing provision to come from, or is that provision put in there just in case some money is left over?

Senator Doody: My understanding is that there is an automatic $2 billion included, but I can check that for the honourable senator. Perhaps I can get the information to him on Monday night, or perhaps I could verify it for him on third reading, whichever he prefers.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators will forgive me but I have to be away on Monday night; that is why I am asking this question. Do we take it, then, that it is the policy of this government that the borrowing authority bill for a financial year should contain a provision that part of the authority will not lapse, so as to permit the government to carry on its borrowing program at the beginning of the next fiscal year in an orderly way?

Senator Doody: That was my understanding, but I think perhaps I had better check it to make sure I am not misleading the senator.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc (Saurel): I suppose that on Monday evening we could have that question posed to the minister, Mrs. McDougall, and then have the answer forwarded to Senator Stewart.

Senator Doody: Very well.

On motion of Senator MacEachen, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Tremblay).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, at the request of Senator Marshall and in his name, I was going to suggest that the debate on the eighth report of the committee be adjourned until tomorrow.

However, since Senator Everett has expressed the desire to speak to this report today, I am pleased to yield to him. Once he has completed his remarks, on behalf of Senator Marshall I will move that the debate be adjourned, as I first wanted to do.

[English]

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Tremblay for his kindness. I called Senator Marshall today in Charlottetown, where he is attending a presentation. It had been his intention to take part in the debate on the report today, but unfortunately he has to delay it until tomorrow. I asked him if, perhaps, I could intervene today. This is an unusual course because as chairman of the subcommittee he would normally speak to the matter in the first instance. However, he very kindly agreed, and, as I say, Senator Tremblay has also agreed to go along with that.

I should say that in entering into the debate on the report I do have some differences with it and, in fact, have a fairly serious difference with the final recommendation. However, beyond that, I think it is an extremely well balanced report and, even if brief, is one that makes very interesting reading.

The report covers, first of all, the chronology of events that led up to the making of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." The producer, as honourable senators likely know, is Mr. Paul Cowan and, in the first instance, he made a submission to the National Film Board on the type of film that he would like to make about Bishop's life. At that stage, it is my understanding, he was suggesting a documentary on Bishop's life with some sort of dramatization of the events. At any rate, he received the approval of the National Film Board for this undertaking. However, he states that when he started to research the matter, he found that certain facts came forth that threw into doubt the veracity of Bishop's claims in respect of the number of aircraft that he had shot down, and most especially about the early dawn raid on Estourmel, for which Bishop received the Victoria Cross.

Mr. Cowan says that at that point he had three choices: He could have dropped the whole undertaking; he could have told what he considered now to be the legend of Bishop's heroism—which, he stated, in his mind would have been false—or he could, in fact, reflect the doubts that he himself had about the veracity of Bishop's claims.

The report does deal with the personal integrity of Mr. Cowan, and I read from page 2 of that report:

... Mr. Cowan denies that his object became to destroy a legend; rather it was to question 'the reasons why heroes, especially war heroes, are created and why countries feel they are necessary.'

Your Committee is convinced that in the conception and execution of the film Mr. Cowan acted with personal and professional integrity; he sought to make the film reflect his personal convictions and to express these convictions in his own way.

It seems to me there is a certain contradiction in terms there. On the one hand, the committee says that they are convinced that, "in the conception and execution of the film Mr. Cowan acted with personal and professional integrity." However, it goes on to say that "he sought to make the film reflect his personal convictions and to express these convictions in his own way."

That, honourable senators, is the basis for my disagreement with the committee's report. I think it was a personal conviction of Mr. Cowan that was reflected in this production. I think Mr. Cowan set out to make an anti-war film and he used the sequences of events that took place and he manipulated them in order to prove his own personal thesis.

In fairness to the report, while it does not criticize Mr. Cowan, it does criticize the National Film Board because it says that when Mr. Cowan decided to go the other way and to debunk the Bishop legend, the National Film Board should have re-assessed the situation and should have guaranteed historical accuracy. That was not done by Mr. Cowan. He did not use any technical experts in getting to the bottom of the facts of the case. In fact, Mr. Cowan did the bulk of the research himself. In the film he does not use interviews with the people who allege these facts, and his research was confined to certain narrow areas.

• (1520)

The report states:

The original objective of the film was not controversial; the revised concept was bound to cause intense controversy. In these circumstances, common prudence, in the opinion of your Committee, should have raised serious questions about whether making such a film was in the public interest, and if so, what precautions should be taken to ensure historical accuracy, particularly since the film would be released as a documentary.

It goes on to state:

—we were surprised to discover that no technical experts or professional historians were retained to assist in the production of the film. Mr. Cowan may have had an understandable urge to exercise the fullest possible creative control, but at least when the film took a “revisionist” slant, there was an obligation on the part of the National Film Board to ensure absolute historical accuracy and probability as much about details as about major themes.

As I have said, honourable senators, the doubts largely centre around the Estoumél raid. This was the raid that took place, as honourable senators will know, when Billy Bishop left early one morning on a solo mission. When he returned his plane was shot up. He claimed to have attacked an airfield behind the German lines, and to have destroyed a number of German planes. For this escapade he was awarded the Victoria Cross.

Mr. Cowan, in reviewing and researching the matter, came to the conclusion that there was no corroboration of what Bishop had done. He did it in the early morning; nobody saw him to it.

German records at the end of the war were largely destroyed, so it was difficult to find evidence as to which field had been destroyed, and what, in fact, Bishop had done.

When he returned from the flight, his Lewis gun was no longer on the plane. It had been removed. I believe Bishop claimed he had removed it in order to lighten the weight to enable him to save gas to get back. There were holes in the plane, it was badly shot up, and it was suggested, again by Mr. Cowan, that the plane was not that badly shot up, that there was no evidence of its being repaired and that it was flown again that very same day.

Based on those points, Mr. Cowan concludes that there is some considerable doubt as to whether or not Bishop ever made that particular raid. In the film he uses an actor—the same actor who played the lead in “Billy Bishop Goes to War”—to play the part of a man named Bourne, who was Bishop’s mechanic.

The process is set up so that Bourne appears to be actually making certain statements that accord with what Cowan wanted to get across. Bourne states that the plane came back without its Lewis gun, and he could not understand how anybody could get the Lewis gun off the plane. He states that the holes in the plane “were just about seven tiny holes in the tail section of the plane.” He implies that Bishop landed the plane, took the Lewis gun off, and shot into the elevator, which would be very difficult to do. He leaves the very strong impression throughout the film that Bishop was a liar and a fraud, and the raid for which he received the Victoria Cross did not, in fact, occur.

The National Film Board released this film as a documentary. In the press release it was stated that the film was a documentary. They entered the film in the Chicago Film Festival, again under the category of a documentary, and they won a prize for the best documentary.

What is a documentary? We had evidence from Mr. Macerola, the Government Film Commissioner, that it is the creative treatment of actuality. He went on to say that anybody in a documentary who claims objectivity is stating that his choices deserve acceptance. In short, what he was saying was that there is an interpretative role in documentaries.

According to the dictionary, there are certain definitions of “documentary”. One is:

Having or claiming an objective quality.

A more modern one is:

Aiming at presentation of reality, a motion picture presenting an activity or occupation of real life without fictional colouring or professional actors.

But no matter what side we come down on, we are faced with the fact that there was no in-depth research done by Mr. Cowan of whether or not Bishop’s claims were correct.

We are, then, presented with conflicting claims, and that is largely ignored in the film. It seems to me that we should have been given the claims as Mr. Cowan saw them, and we should have then been given the claims as so many other people saw them and while there might have been interpretation on Mr. Cowan’s part, nonetheless that would have given the viewer the right to determine which interpretation was correct.

But that was not done. What was done was to present, in a very persuasive way, especially through the mouth of the actor who played Bourne the mechanic, that Bishop was a fraud. There was nothing that people could look at and say: Yes, I can understand Mr. Cowan’s point of view. Perhaps Bishop did land the plane and take the Lewis gun off; perhaps somehow he got under the elevator and managed to blast seven holes in the tail; perhaps he flew back and made a claim that was false. On the other hand, perhaps the other interpretation that is given by so many people who knew Bishop, who flew with Bishop, and who understood what was going on in that war was correct and that Bishop, in fact, did leave alone, did undertake the raid; did, in trying to scurry back to safety after a successful raid, jettison his Lewis gun; did land with his plane badly shot up, and did take off again later in that day to fly the plane elsewhere. There is too much evidence that Bishop’s history is one that can be trusted. There are too many people who were there and who were on the scene. There are too many people who have done in-depth research, not the minimal research that Mr. Cowan did, who make the case that Bishop was in fact an air ace; he was, indeed, a person who shot down a great number of planes—and does it matter whether it was 72, or 62, or 52? He was nevertheless a great war ace. He had intended, after talking to the great English war ace, Albert Ball, to make the raid on Estourmel, or to make a dawn raid, and, in fact, he did it.

● (1530)

What I ask myself is: Why didn't Mr. Cowan give us the opportunity to make that choice? He says for himself that he was looking for the truth. In one part of his evidence he says, "Whatever we call it, I still believe what the film says is true."

Well, I think everybody is looking for the truth. But the personal truth, as seen by Mr. Cowan in a movie that is called a documentary, that is issued by the official film organization of the Government of Canada, that is issued around the world as a documentary and is entered in a film festival as a documentary—surely that kind of film should be balanced and both sides of the case should be given. If Mr. Cowan wants to make an interpretation, then, perhaps, he is free to do it even within the confines of a documentary. But he has an obligation, and the National Film Board has an obligation, to give both sides of the picture.

When we interviewed Mr. Macerola, he said that he would agree to call it a "docu-drama," as though that solved the problem. Well, I have not been able to find any definition anywhere of what a "docu-drama" really is. Perhaps a "docu-drama" is that which dramatizes the event in a more meaningful way and uses professional actors for the process. If that is what it is, then the film did just that. But, I can find nowhere anything that gives the producer of the film, or the director of the film, the right not to make a balanced assessment of the situation. He may, indeed, dramatize the situation; he may, indeed, use actors, but he still, surely, has the obligation to say that there are two sides to the question and not to do what Mr. Cowan did, which was to say that there is only one side.

In the summary of the report we read the following:

"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" is a highly dramatized and one-sided account of Billy Bishop's life and his exploits. . . . Research for this film overlooked a wealth of Canadian sources, veterans, and expertise on this subject, and concentrated instead on a few British sources. Through the technique of "interviewing" from time to time an actor in the role of Bishop's mechanic, the film gives a false and misleading authority to what is, in the view of most historians, rumour and unpublished speculation. While Mr. Cowan and the National Film Board have every right to express reservations about Bishop's record, your Committee questions whether the public interest is served, as required by the Act establishing the NFB, by representing these rumours, which seem to have arisen some time after the events described, as based on first-hand, eyewitness evidence.

Then the report goes on to the final recommendations and it says:

The Committee has unanimously adopted the following recommendation:

That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added:

This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne.

It goes on to state:

Some members feel that this recommendation does not go far enough.

I happen to be one of those people who feel that the recommendation does not go far enough. I think this film purported to be a documentary. As I say, it was released as a documentary; it was entered in the festival as a documentary; and it was never made clear, in any way, that it was not.

Those of you who have seen the film will realize that every trick of the trade is used to create the feeling of authenticity about the claims that Mr. Cowan makes. He used the process of a recreation of events in order to establish the idea that they actually took place. It is not a case of interviewing somebody named Bourne, who was, say, 90 years old, and with faulty memory is trying to recall what the plane looked like when Bishop came back from the raid; it is a case of using an actor, who looks exactly like Bourne would look in black and white, creating the impression that he is right there at the time the plane landed, that he is making his assessment at that particular point in time.

There is no additional evidence that Bourne ever said the things that he is supposed to have said. As a matter of fact, there is a good deal of circumstantial evidence that Bourne said no such thing and that these words were put in his mouth by Mr. Cowan.

I think that any reasonable person viewing that movie would come to the conclusion that Bishop's claims in respect of the number of kills that he had, and in respect, most especially, of that raid, were false; that he did not deserve the Victoria Cross, and that he was a fraud. I do not think that is good enough for the National Film Board of Canada.

Senator Hicks: Hear, hear.

Senator Everett: Now, I know there are claims that we should not act as censors; but surely there is an obligation on the other side that in the presentation of the case to the public—even accepting the interpretation of the producer that he prefers one side to the other—the public should be given the right to choose. The public, in a situation like this, should be given the right to choose.

● (1540)

I am certainly not satisfied that it is called a "docu-drama" because, whether it is a docu-drama or a documentary, the obligation to show both sides still exists. The committee is recommending that they say at the beginning of the film that there are fictional aspects to it. I understand that has been rejected by the National Film Board, but, even if it were accepted, I do not think that is satisfactory either. In particular, I think those parts of the film which involve the actor who played Bourne should be removed.

I believe a much more balanced account should be given, and, if Mr. Cowan then wants to add his interpretation to it, he is free to do so; he has that right. In my opinion, to leave this film in the state it is in, to denigrate the name of a war hero, is unsatisfactory. Whether you like war heroes or not is immaterial. I do not suppose war heroes are always very nice people, but there is nothing in this film that indicates that the people who go to war go because they believe they are defending some sort of concept. The whole film is based on the fact that in its early stages World War I—and, by implication, World War II—was fought to preserve an arrogant, almost feudal way of life and that the reason there are wars is because generals train armies and, therefore, they want wars; the reason there are heroes is because generals require them, so they make them out of whole cloth.

This is the basis of Mr. Cowan's philosophy about war. There is nothing at all in the film about the fact that the majority of people who went to war in World War II went because they thought they were protecting their way of life and their society against tyranny. Mr. Cowan does not deal with that.

What he does, in order to prove how horrible and how unnecessary war is, is to denigrate somebody who, so far as we know and so far as the record can tell, was an authentic war hero and somebody whom perhaps we should more likely venerate.

Honourable senators, I think the report is well-balanced; well-written; and, happily, brief, but I think the final recommendation begs the question. I do not think that we should allow either Mr. Cowan or the National Film Board to get away with it.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, for Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Fairbairn).

[Senator Everett.]

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I welcome this second opportunity to redirect our focus to the problems of youth in our society, problems which were at the centre of the nation's attention when Parliament adjourned prior to Easter. You may recall that I was just getting into a travelogue on the work of our committee when we were interrupted so that Royal Assent might be given to legislation from the House of Commons. At that time, all of us were gripped by concern for our colleague, Senator Jacques Hébert, as his hunger strike for youth stretched on through days and then weeks. I think all of us share a very sincere sense of relief that developments, in the form of a committee of private citizens who pledged to raise funds to carry forth the concept of Katimavik, persuaded Senator Hébert to end his three-week fast.

However, I re-enter the discussion on the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth with a sense of apprehension that that very feeling of relief at the end of the hunger strike may once again remove the reality of youth problems from a priority position on our national agenda. Promises of immediate new programs and initiatives for youth, which had been offered by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons last month, remain unfulfilled. We are told that perhaps there will be something next month or in June, and I sincerely hope, trust and, indeed, look forward to seeing those programs. Even in the space of two weeks, this difficult issue may have receded from the front of our consciousness back into the columns of dry statistics and hollow rhetoric.

When I began my speech on March 26, I was trying to indicate the depth of reality behind those statistics; a human dimension which is not readily appreciated, perhaps, by a number of Canadians nor solved by simply more money or new names for old programs. I was trying to share with this house involvement in the personal experience our committee members shared with those who appeared at our public hearings across the country to discuss what has been called "a young generation at risk." I had outlined testimony of the grim reality of the jobless future heard in Regina and in St. John's, Newfoundland, and the shock of illiteracy encountered in a youth survey in New Brunswick.

Today I should like to continue that journey, moving to Toronto where the hard facts of the illiteracy problem came to us from Frontier College which operates programs across Canada to fight this frightening deficiency, the inability to read, write or understand.

From Frontier College, we heard from an instructor who, himself, had not begun reading until he was 33 years old. He was involved in a program called "Beat the Street" where he literally took to the streets to bring in young people who had fled the school system because they were illiterate and unable to cope. He told us there were 3,000 being served in Metropolitan Toronto out of some 450,000 illiterates in that city. There are an estimated 4 million illiterates in Canada. "It is large and terrifying," he told our committee.

In Halifax, we heard a tough and compelling brief about the young people whose skills are lost to our community for a lifetime because of the invisible handicap of learning disability. As many as 20 per cent of the young people in Canada are affected by some aspect of that problem. Our witness talked about the fine line between suicide and murder as these young people grow up to become adults in despair, caught by a frustration so great that they cannot decide whether to do themselves in or to destroy somebody else, in a system that does not understand them.

• (1550)

In Ottawa we learned from two determined and courageous young people involved in the Royal Ottawa Hospital adolescents program about the everyday problems of transportation, accessibility, attendant care and social attitudes which prevent independent-minded handicapped youth from pursuing the constructive life that they are trying to achieve.

Everywhere across the country, honourable senators, alcohol and drug abuse rank near the top of the chronic problems of young people, cutting across age groups and economic classes. They are by-products of dropping out, of frustrations with an education system that does not help teach one how to live, of unemployment, of lack of skills, of family breakdown, of abuse—they are the results of a universal need to dull reality. In Charlottetown, in beautiful Prince Edward Island, we heard the toughest testimony from a young man who told us that he was a drug addict and an alcoholic from the age of 13. "I should be dead," he said, estimating that, in 13 years of addiction, he cost society half a million dollars due to the costs incurred in keeping him in hospital, jails, mental institutions and detoxification wards. There is no facility for treating young people in Prince Edward Island. They are either mixed in with adults in adult institutions or they are sent outside the province to the United States for treatment which does not stick. We were shaken to learn the extent of the street problems of young people in that small island.

In Edmonton, we had been on the road for only about two days and some committee members were expressing concern that we were not hearing from some of those groups with the greatest need—the dropouts who are seeking work without skills, who are literally on the street just to stay alive. Naturally, this group would neither know of, nor would they be particularly attracted by appearing before, a Senate committee—or, indeed anybody else—to discuss those problems. However, we did have a chance to talk to some young people who had been pulled into the system through an inter-city youth program run by the McMan Youth Service Association in Edmonton. These young people were nervous and uncomfortable, while we were awkward and rushed by an overcrowded schedule. For them, this encounter was an enormous experience. And we, without meaning to, alienated them by appearing not to listen to the explanations of a program that is designed for young people so severely disadvantaged that they do not have the skills to become employed, even if there were a buoyant economy and plenty of jobs.

"This is really important stuff," a young girl said to us, struggling to keep her composure. She did not think we were paying attention. "Maybe we don't fit in here. . . but we are people, too," she exploded and fled from the room in tears of frustration and anger. I will never forget her and I doubt whether my colleagues on the committee will, either.

In Vancouver, we were challenged by a dynamic student from the National Black Coalition of Canada, who wanted to know what we, the senators, were going to be doing six months after the report. Would we drop it and run? What would happen at the end of the International Year of Youth? Would the Minister of Youth be around to help or would all of the serious concerns that young people were urged and encouraged to discuss simply be dropped or shunted aside? In other words, were we up to keeping our side of the bargain or was it just a lot of talk? Senator Gigantès told her that what we were hearing from her was a scream of frustration. "We will scream along with you until somebody listens," he said. Senator Bielish said it all, really, when she assured this intense and sceptical young woman by saying, "If you had a hammer and a row of nails, then you have not missed any of them," in putting forward her views.

In Montreal we encountered, as we did everywhere, the issue of dropouts from an education system which produces young people who are ill prepared to find a job "in the labour market jungle", as one young witness put it. The education system is judged to be totally unable to develop the independence, creativity, initiative and responsibility in students to guide them and their interests towards training for a career. We were told by a 15-year old that most teens drop out because they have no challenges and no dreams. They drop out because they are bored. "We are your future doctors and lawyers," she said. "I think society would be shocked to know what is happening. I am not talking about teens who are poor and unemployed, but all teens everywhere."

In several centres we heard from adults about teen-age sexuality and teen-age pregnancies. There has been a revolution in attitudes in Newfoundland over the last 10 years on this issue. A decade ago, 90 per cent of teen-age mothers gave up their children compared with 90 per cent today who choose to keep their babies.

In Toronto, teen-age mothers came to our committee—children carrying their children. There was a 16-year old with her baby daughter who was having trouble getting adequate housing because you have to be 18 years old to sign a lease. Another young mother was staying in a shelter until she and her child could get the money to change the locks on her apartment, because she was waiting for the police to pick up her partner, who broke in and beat her. The shelter system in Toronto is bursting. The teen mothers need job training and there is no place where they can afford to leave their babies. The YMCA and other organizations are doing their best, but again, it is shocking to deal with these living statistics.

Finally, there is the chapter of our report dealing with native people. Every aspect of youth concern is underlined and magnified in the context of the young people of our first nations. This is an area of federal responsibility and, as such, in our view warrants a separate discussion.

Honourable senators, "intolerable" is the only word to describe the outlook for a native youth or a native child in 1986. In spite of the beacons of progress, such as the Saskatchewan Federated Indian College in Regina and the Round Lake drug and alcohol abuse centre in the interior of British Columbia, to name only two, the underlying desperation in first nation communities and groups across the country and in the north remains very real.

At the centre is the question of self-esteem, and, if one takes that back to its beginnings, we are talking about the basic need for progress on issues of settling land claims and self-government, which overhang any discussion of native problems for the young or the old.

Meanwhile, however, we heard of the constant fight of young people to survive and prove their own self-worth in the white society. "When you fight all your life, it is hard to learn. You tend to reject everything," we were told by a young native boy in Edmonton. In discussing the staggering drop-out rate of native youth, we were told bluntly by another young person, "It is hard to expect kids who do not have enough food to spend many hours in school." There was the cry from Vancouver: "Honourable senators, our people are dying from alcohol and drug abuse," which was followed by testimony about a 16-year old who shot himself because, while he did not drink, he felt intimidated by his family members who did.

In the north there is the remoteness, the made-in-downtown-Toronto education curricula, which are irrelevant in many native communities; and the almost total absence of work and hope. All of these problems were compounded by alcohol and drugs—and often by solvents, because they were available and cheap. This was a shocking commentary for members of our committee to listen to, and perhaps even more so when only a few weeks ago we could see the reality in a small Métis community in northern Alberta, where, I believe, six young people died because of drinking methyl hydrate.

● (1600)

One of the spokespeople of the Alberta Native Women's Association, in commenting on this tragedy in Peerless Lake, Alberta, said, "It's not like they have jobs or an education, or any kind of a future at stake. They haven't got a lot to lose. Our children have lost hope, and when the children of natives lose hope, then it's genocide."

For me the most shocking and moving moment of the whole Youth Committee experience came at the end of a long day in Halifax, when a very animated young native spokesperson opened his presentation by saying, "I do not have a written brief prepared. In fact, one was being prepared, but the chap who was preparing it committed suicide three weeks ago. He was 21." Honourable senators, our committee, including myself, sat there in silence, because there was nothing to say.

These are just a few vignettes which stand out in my mind from our travels. Other senators will have different recollections of the highs and lows of those public hearings. What matters is that our committee—and I believe it is fair to say that the individuals on that committee became closer as the days went by—merely scratched the surface of the enormous problem facing a most vital segment of our society. Indeed, it is the segment which will determine the face of Canadian society in the future.

In addition to the difficulties, there was also much that was positive in what we heard; and from that we have fashioned some 26 recommendations, which were detailed in the excellent speech of our deputy chairman, Senator Yuzyk. Some of those recommendations go to the heart of our education system, as described so eloquently by our colleague, Senator Marsden. Other specific areas of those recommendations will, I am sure, be featured in speeches by other colleagues who served on that committee.

This is really not a report written by a dozen senators. It is really written by those who took the time, and, in many cases, showed the courage, to come to talk to us. It is a report inspired by the thoughts and words of those who are living their lives as statistics, by those who cannot move on to the next city or province as we can. It is also a report written by Canadians who are trying to use their knowledge and experience to help young people.

As I have said, Senator Yuzyk detailed the recommendations in this report, and I will not attempt to go into as much detail as he did. In our recommendations we focused to an extent on the problem of education, which led us to recommend a national task force on the co-ordination of educational qualifications, which basically would be conducted by ministers of education from the provinces and territories, with a federal representative, to try to co-ordinate qualifications and goals of education across this country.

It became clear, in view of the enormity of mileage across this country, how difficult it is for young people even to plot a career when what they may be studying in one area does not fit in with the goals and requirements in another. I know that I myself, when I moved from the University of Alberta to Carleton University back in 1960, discovered on arrival that the B.A. from Alberta was not sufficient to qualify me to undertake graduate studies at Carleton. As a result, I had to take extra courses in order to meet those qualifications—which is fair ball, except that was in 1960, a long time ago; and it would appear that little has changed.

We have certainly endorsed the recommendation that was put before our committee by a number of people for a national campaign on illiteracy. We heard with great interest and hope from several witnesses about the success which co-operative education has had in bringing together schools, private industry and others in the professions during the learning years, particularly here in Ontario. In our report we have talked about the possibility of federal and provincial governments looking at the idea of young people being able to use unemployment and social welfare assistance as part payment in connection with apprenticeship and training positions with business or industry. We talk about the overall problem of restraint measures introduced by governments, federal or provincial, and the need for governments to take a look at how this will affect young people, and take corrective action before this kind of cut-back and restriction causes even more deprivation to that segment of our society.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

We have urged that pilot projects be launched by the government to test the feasibility of work sharing and job sharing, which has been discussed as a possible solution not just for young people but also for others in our society who are faced with unemployment.

In our report we talk about the establishment of a young Canadians' community service program, which, in a sense, would pick up on some of the ideas of the now defunct Katimavik concept, and would provide a bridge which some young Canadians desperately need between their schooling—which in many cases is unsatisfactory—and when their search for a new career or job begins.

We have talked about and, indeed, supported the concept of a special youth television channel in this country, given that it is a medium that has such a profound effect and influence on young people. I believe that this proposal still rests before the CRTC.

• (1610)

In our chapter on native concerns, one of our recommendations is that a standing committee of this house on native issues be struck and that it have on it ex officio members from the native community. This committee would not be specifically designed to handle problems of youth, although one of the first items of business for consideration, as we see it, would be to deal with the overwhelming and urgent problems faced by young native people. Clearly, the entire issue facing the first native peoples in our country is not one that will be solved next week or next year. It is the feeling of the members of the committee that this issue goes to the core of our national conscience to such a degree that the Senate should have a standing committee on native affairs. There were a number of recommendations dealing with native Canadians in our committee report. The central point of them is that one of the difficulties for native people in this country is that we—the government or white society—are always deciding what is good for them. In the entire consideration of native problems and native youth problems, it is absolutely essential that ways, funding and structures be put together that will permit the native Canadians themselves to become involved in developing, for example, their own education programs and their own social programs.

These recommendations are wide-ranging, and often they are based on simple challenges—to the government, to the private sector, to educators—to all of us to use our common sense, rather than hiding behind convenient jurisdictional barriers or relying on somebody else to pick up the ball.

Regardless of the political philosophy about the role of government in our society, it seems to me that Canadians at all institutional levels and in every region must face the fact that if ever there was a case for intervention, the future of our young people is that case. They are faced with barricades of every description—economic, social, emotional, physical and racial, and they simply cannot move those barricades by themselves. They need our help and they need it now.

The federal government has a responsibility to unite this effort across our country. Surely a problem of this nature and dimension goes to the very heart of the role of a national government. It is much more than dollars and cents, although we all know and accept the necessity of federal generosity in that respect. Nor is it a question of usurping someone else's constitutional powers. It is a question of the federal government acting as a facilitator and a persuader to ensure to the utmost that all the institutional powers in this country are focused on this problem and not working at cross purposes.

Let us not pretend, honourable senators, that old systems are working when the evidence is overwhelming that they are not. No one, neither governments nor individuals, wishes to be reminded of his or her own mortality. Let us face it; we only pass this way once. There is no second chance to come to grips with the enormous problems facing our youth. For many, it may already be too late to profit in any meaningful way from changes. Society may adapt to change too slowly for this current generation. I suggest to this house that it would be a tragedy not to give it our best shot, give it our best effort, at the very least, in preparation for the young people who are just entering the learning process.

Whatever the controversy surrounding Senator Hébert's extraordinary protest, one fact is clear. In a peaceful, non-violent way he focused the attention of Canadians through the media on our young people more directly than any other action in the last 20 years.

Like it or not, we are conscious of the task before us. It remains for us to prove now, as parliamentarians, as government, that our national conscience has been similarly touched to act for youth.

In a sense, our report is a guidebook to the volumes of testimony from our hearings which I hope some members of the government will read in its entirety. Meanwhile we in this chamber can take one step forward by formally endorsing the conclusions of the youth committee. Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Frith, the adoption by this house of "A Plan of Action", the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth.

In conclusion, I would like to make it clear that by moving this motion, it is not my intention in any way to curtail debate on this issue but, rather, to focus it and direct it more specifically by moving the adoption of this report.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Murray, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSALS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on 26th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, it is my intention to make a few brief remarks on the subject of universality in response to the speech that was made by my honourable colleague, Senator Everett, whose comments may be found in the Debates of the Senate of Wednesday, March 12, 1986 at page 2145.

• (1620)

Honourable senators, in recent discussions of how best to reduce the deficit and government expenditures, the principle of universality of social programs has been attacked. It has been argued that universality in programs such as the family allowance and old age security is too expensive, and valuable money could be saved by giving benefits only to the needy. The issue of universality has also been raised with respect to the controversy over extra-billing in Ontario.

Canada's first federal social security programs—the Old Age Pension, 1927 and War Veterans' Allowances, 1930—were selective, providing assistance only to those with an identifiable need. However, the experience during the 1930s depression publicized the stigma associated with having to ask for public money and led to discussions of a basic minimum standard of living provided by the federal government. Widespread unemployment and poverty was clearly a national and international issue rather than a municipal or personal one.

In 1944, the Family Allowance Act provided the first universal benefits in Canada for all children under 16, regardless of their family income. By 1951, Old Age Security became a universal benefit. The previous means test was discarded because it was considered embarrassing and a disincentive for people to save for their old age. If benefits were given only to those with little income, people would lose their benefits if they increased their earnings or would not be entitled at all if they had been thrifty.

In arguing against selective programs, it was suggested that restricting social benefits to the poor creates a division between those who receive government benefits and those who pay for them. Consequently, some needy people refuse to apply for benefits because they do not want to admit that they need them. By attempting to preserve their dignity, they increase their poverty.

When medicare was created in 1966, universality was one of the basic principles of this program, along with comprehensive coverage, portability and non-profit administration. But because doctors have been primarily private practitioners in Canada, remuneration was based on fee-for-service from the beginning of medicare. Several provinces, such as Alberta and Ontario, allowed doctors to bill their patients more than the fees established by the provincial health insurance commission. Some provinces even allowed doctors to opt out of the provincial plan and bill patients directly.

Despite provincial variations in billing practices, many people have argued that extra-billing should never have been allowed in the first place because it violates the essential principle that medical care should be accessible to everyone, regardless of their ability to pay. A 1982 study for the Canadian Centre for Policy Alternatives found that up to 93 per cent of some medical specialists in Alberta extra-bill, and that they sometimes do so for all patients, including those on welfare. The National Anti-Poverty Organization released a report in 1984 providing case histories of low-income people who have been adversely affected by extra-billing, user fees and health care premiums. The report suggested that poor people often avoid necessary medical treatment if they know or think that their doctor extra-bills. Findings such as these led to the Canada Health Act in 1984, by which federal grants were withheld from provinces continuing to allow extra-billing and user fees on the premise that these practices violated the principle of universal accessibility.

Doctors have used the issue of extra-billing to try to maintain their professional autonomy. While this motivation is understandable, we cannot accept the claim by some doctors that extra-billing allows the more skillful and experienced physicians a chance to earn more. In fact, extra-billing is not based on skill or experience but merely on the decision of an individual doctor. Considering that extra-billing prevents some people from obtaining health care, it cannot be tolerated within a public health insurance system which espouses universal accessibility.

In our attempts to reduce the deficit and cut government expenditures, there are many areas where true "fat" can be cut. But universal programs are not expendable. In making certain government programs selective, we need to spend more money to sort out those who really need assistance from those who do not. With universal programs, it is not necessary to spend money to decide and to monitor who gets the benefit. Furthermore, money is taxed back from those with adequate resources. Universal programs reach the needy without stigmatizing them.

In attacking the deficit, we cannot assume that women do not need the family allowance if their husbands have adequate incomes. Nor can we assume that doctors will not extra-bill the poor. We cannot afford to remove the "safety net" or to regress to an era when we distinguished between the "deserving poor" and the "undeserving."

Universality remains a sound principle in social programs and should not be seen as frivolous. Let us look for reduction of the deficit elsewhere.

On motion of Senator Frith for Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

Tuesday, April 15, 1986

The Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

(Statutory Instruments No. 33)

1. In accordance with its permanent reference, section 26 of the Statutory Instruments Act, S.C. 1970-71-72, c. 38, and the Order of Reference approved by the Senate and the House of Commons on December 13, 1984, the Joint Committee wishes to draw the attention of both Houses to SOR/85-85, Canadian Home Insulation Regulations, amendment, and SOR/85-86, Canadian Home Insulation Regulations (N.S. and P.E.I.), amendment. The principal Regulations, made pursuant to the Canadian Home Insulation Act, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 57, and the Oil Substitution and Conservation Act, S.C. 1980-81-82-83, c. 59, provided for the making of payments in respect of the cost of insulating against heat loss and specified the terms and conditions under which and subject to which such payments were to be made.

2. Until January 18, 1985, applicants under the Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP) were entitled to a payment representing 60 per cent of the material and service costs incurred by them to insulate a family housing unit or residential building. The Canadian Home Insulation Program was originally scheduled to end in December 1987 but in the Fall of 1984, the Government announced that the Program would be terminated on March 31, 1986.

In a press release issued by her Department on November 16, 1984, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources also announced the Government's intention to reduce the contribution payable to applicants from 60 per cent to 33 1/3 per cent of eligible insulation costs effective January 1, 1985. In order to maintain their entitlement to the higher rate of contribution, applicants were expected to register a commitment to purchase eligible conservation materials and services by December 31, 1984, and to complete the related insulation work by March 31, 1985. These changes to the Program were announced in November of 1984, but the regulatory amendments implementing them were only adopted on January 17, 1985.

The amendments registered as SOR/85-85 and SOR/85-86 required applicants to have registered a purchase commitment by the close of business on December 31, 1984 to obtain the higher rate of contribution. Insofar as the amendments were adopted 17 days after December 31, 1984, and published in the Canada Gazette 37 days after that date, those relying on the Regulations could not possibly preserve their entitlement to the higher rate of contribution. To put it somewhat differently, applicants who, until January 17, 1985—the date of coming into force of the amendments under report—had a right to a payment representing 60 per cent of their eligible insulating costs, were denied that right on the ground that they had not done something (i.e. register a purchase commitment) they were under no legal obligation to do at the relevant time. These applicants were effectively penalized for omitting to act in accordance with the Minister's announcement, not for any failure to abide by legally prescribed requirements.

3. When this situation was brought to the attention of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, your Committee was informed that: "the 83,950 signed commitments which were registered with CHIP by December 31, 1984 are evidence that the Minister's announcement was effectively communicated to the public". The Deputy Minister explained that the Minister's decision: "was widely publicized, both by EMR and the media. Teleposts were sent to all [Canadian General Standards Board] listed contractors, industry associations and building supply stores. As well, the Heatline Office and CHIP Regional Offices informed all telephone callers of this announcement".

However, when your Committee sought to know how many applications for a 60 per cent contribution filed after December 31, 1984, were rejected on the ground that a purchase commitment ought to have been registered before that date, it was informed that: "Unfortunately, statistics were not kept on the number of registrations that were rejected".

4. Your Committee is not satisfied with these explanations. We are unimpressed by the argument that a large number of applicants were aware before December 31, 1984, that they should register a purchase commitment in order to preserve their entitlement to a higher rate of contribution. That many applicants knew of the Minister's intention to modify the law will not mask the failure in fairness to those who did not. Citizens have a right to rely exclusively on the laws adopted by Parliament and its delegates and should not be made to govern their conduct and affairs in accordance with press releases and other public announcements. The right of all to the equal protection and benefit of the law must always come ahead of administrative convenience or expediency and in no circumstances should citizens be expected or compelled to obey anything but the published laws of Canada.

If rules affecting a citizen's entitlement to a benefit are to be changed, this should be done well before the date on which the changes are to take effect, and never should those changes have a retroactive application. The amendments under report could have and should have been drafted, enacted and published well before December 31, 1984. If regulation-making is to be based on the principles of openness, fairness, efficiency and accountability, as called for in the Citizen's Code of Regulatory Fairness, it is essential that regulatory initiatives which impose new burdens on citizens or, as in the present case, which detrimentally affect their rights, be announced and enacted as part of the law a reasonable time before they are to come into effect.

5. Insofar as the amendments under report deprived persons of a benefit conferred by law on the basis of a retroactive requirement, your Committee is of the view they were not authorized by the enabling legislation, amounted to an unusual use of the powers granted by Parliament, and infringed the rule of law and the principles of fairness and natural justice.

Respectfully submitted,

NATHAN NURGITZ
Joint Chairman

THE SENATE

Thursday, April 17, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons to acquaint the Senate that the Report of the Commissioner of Official Languages for the calendar year 1985 had been referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-SIXTH AND TWENTY-SEVENTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

The Hon. the Speaker, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, presented the committee's twenty-sixth and twenty-seventh reports, approving supplementary budgets of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

(For text of reports see today's Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, under our new procedure of having the Senate adopt the reports of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, I propose to move the adoption of these reports. However, I suggest that my motion not be adopted today but that the text of these reports appear in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate so that honourable senators may have the opportunity to read them. Then, next week we can deal with the motion for their adoption.

These reports do not raise a question of the Senate's having to have a report before it deals with a motion for authority. The authority to spend funds with respect to both these matters concerning this committee is already there. However, we felt that it would be a good idea for the Senate to actually adopt these reports rather than simply table them.

So, honourable senators, the motion can stand until next week.

Reports placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

COMPETITION TRIBUNAL

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-91

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-91, intituled: "An Act to establish the Competition Tribunal and to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and other Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Honourable senators, if leave is granted I will express my apologies for not having consulted directly with the leadership on the other side. However, I can say that this motion represents a consensus of the committee after the committee looked long and hard at the work ahead of it over the next month or two.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the committee has a very busy schedule during the next few months. The committee still has the green paper before it; there are at least three pieces of legislation arising from the budget; there is the Competition Bill, to which I have just referred, and other legislation. We do want to get a head start on this business.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the motion does not come as a complete surprise, because I had been told that the committee considered a pre-study of Bill C-91 and Bill C-103. While we have some reservations about agreeing to a pre-study of Bill C-103 at this time—not the subject of pre-study in general—we support the motion for a pre-study of Bill C-91.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 22nd April, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government could tell us what bills he expects to be before the Senate next week. We will exhaust the order paper, at least with respect to legislation, today, except for the borrowing authority bill. I wonder what legislation we can expect from the other place next week.

Senator Doody: We do have the borrowing authority bill for third reading and we hope it will receive Royal Assent next week. We also have reason to believe that we will receive the Canadian Arsenal bill, Bill C-87. We have been told that the probability is that that will be before the Senate next week. We also have reason to believe that the Employment Equity Bill, Bill C-62, will be before the Senate next week.

So, we will have that legislation, plus whatever remains on the order paper after today. That should keep honourable senators busy in the Senate, at least reasonably busy, and the committees will be working all out next week.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—POSITION OF UNITED STATES

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to try to clear up what, at least on the surface, seem to be very confusing and, indeed, conflicting statements if the ordinary definition of words that we use is to be applied.

For example, yesterday the United States Senate Finance Committee decided to postpone a vote on whether or not it would give the Administration the authority to enter into the "fast-track" negotiations. Along with doing that, the chairman of that committee sent a letter signed by 12 of the 20 senators saying that, "the majority of the committee will not support the Administration's request for the talks to begin." Yet it is reported today in several newspapers that the Prime Minister has said that this postponement is a hopeful sign. What in the name of common sense does that mean, when you have the postponement along with a letter saying that the majority of the members of that committee do not intend to support the Administration's request?

• (1405)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Well, I think it would be unwise for us to jump to any conclusions as to what that committee will do. It is perfectly true that they have issued such a letter to the President. It is also true that it is a letter that outlines certain interests that they have which they think should be addressed by the President. It remains to be seen exactly what happens. I think the hopeful part is that it does provide a breathing space during which people can reconsider their positions and see whether there is any change in the apparent deadlock that will lead to a decision that would be acceptable to us Canadians. But it seems to me that we simply have to be optimistic and hopeful, because this is a matter which is between the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States. The President has given us his assurances in this matter and we are inclined to rely on those until we find out that the situation has altered.

Senator Olson: Well, I suppose the situation could be altered somewhat by the letter that is signed by a majority of the senators on that committee, including the chairman. What I am really asking is whether the government is really levelling with us, or whether they are just whistling in the dark.

There is another question that I would like to have cleared up, if it is possible. The Prime Minister is also reported to have said that he has no plans to become involved in trying to persuade the senators to support the request for free trade. Yet the Minister for International Trade, James Kelleher, said in Toronto on Tuesday that Canada has launched an intensive lobbying effort of its own. What kind of sense are we to take from those two statements?

Senator Roblin: Well, I would like to reply to the first question, as to whether we are levelling with the Canadian people or whistling in the dark. We are doing our best to be realistic, but that does not prevent us from looking on the bright side. What is the point of assuming that something will happen when it hasn't happened? When it does happen, if it happens that the 12 senators stick to their guns and they do not allow this motion to go forward, then we are going to have to reconsider our position seriously, as I stated in this house yesterday, and I will repeat that.

With respect to the statement of the two ministers, the Prime Minister was talking about his personal intervention in this difference of opinion between certain members of the committee and the President of the United States. No one would expect him to interfere in that. But, over the long haul, in the many activities that are going on in connection with trade between Canada and the United States, of course other ministers are taking a very active part; and so, indeed, is our embassy.

Senator Olson: Then it is true that the Government of Canada has launched an intensive lobbying campaign in Washington. I accept that he has said that the Prime Minister is not going to be personally involved in contacting the senators. I understand that. But when the Prime Minister says that he has no plans to become involved, he is referring to himself personally, not the activities of the government.

Senator Roblin: I think the Prime Minister's statement speaks for itself, as does the statement of the minister.

Senator Olson: No, honourable senators, with great respect it does not. The statements are contradictory. The minister,

Mr. Kelleher, says that they have launched, or were about to launch, an intensified lobbying campaign. And the Prime Minister says—and he does not single himself out as speaking personally—that he has no plans to lobby the senators. That is a contradiction, however you want to cut it.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do not see it that way.

● (1410)

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CANADIAN USE OF LOBBYIST

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, I have several related questions for the Leader of the Government. Why did the Government of Canada retain Michael K. Deaver, the former White House Deputy Chief of Staff, to lobby in Washington on behalf of the Government of Canada? When did this contract begin? Is it still in effect? And how much money did or does the Government of Canada pay for this service?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I will take that as an order for return.

Senator Davey: I also have a supplementary question which the leader may also look into for me. Why is the United States Office of Government Ethics investigating Mr. Deaver's lobbying on behalf of Canada?

Senator Roblin: I think my honourable friend will have to ask the American authorities that question, not me.

Senator Olson: We are paying for it.

LIBYA

EVACUATION OF CANADIAN NATIONALS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Earlier this week, I asked him about contingency plans to remove or airlift Canadians from Libya should they wish to leave. We learned today from our representative in Libya, Mr. Michel Tessier, that, having contacted Canadians, about one-quarter of them want to leave.

I wonder whether the Leader of the Government in the Senate can give us any clear indication of how that would be brought about, whether or not our own National Defence aircraft or Hercules aircraft have permission to effect such an airlift, or exactly what plans this government has.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I wonder if I read the same article as my friend did, because it did not seem to me that it said 25 per cent of Canadians in Libya, namely 25 per cent of 1,300, were desirous of leaving; I thought it said 25. If I am mistaken on that, my friend can correct me.

The latest information we have from our representative in Tripoli is that there are a few Canadians who have given some signs of wanting to leave and, as the Tripoli airport is now open and flights are expected to resume, there seems to be no difficulty in accommodating them.

[Senator Olson.]

As to the main question regarding contingency plans for the removal of Canadians from Libya should they wish to leave and should it become necessary, the answer is: Yes, there are contingency plans in place, but I do not think I should say any more about it at this time except to give that assurance.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I want to thank the Leader of the Government in the Senate for the $6 million which was paid to the potato growers of Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Bonnell: I told all the people of Prince Edward Island how we in the Senate, through my efforts and those of our leader, were able to get this for them on the eve of an election.

Senator Perrault: Call more elections!

Senator Bonnell: They know now that it was through the efforts of the opposition in the Senate, working with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that that $6 million came to them.

Senator Argue: There is a lot of truth in that.

Senator Doody: Now for the good news.

Senator Frith: With the Litton contract stuffed in one hand.

Senator Bonnell: With regard to the comment someone made about Litton, can the Leader of the Government in the Senate assure me that yesterday—four days before the election in Prince Edward Island—an agreement was signed with Litton involving Prince Edward Island or are we continuing in negotiations which have been going on for some months? Did the government yesterday agree to sign the agreement with Litton so that all these jobs in Prince Edward Island would be available by Monday next?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I am sure there will be a few jobs, perhaps 42, which will be available for distribution on Monday next in Prince Edward Island, but I do not think any of the people will be working for Litton.

I might tell my honourable friend that if he does not like the timing of the government's announcement on potatoes he should be careful when he asks his questions because you never can tell when you are going to get what you ask for, and that is precisely what happened to him.

As far as the balance of his question is concerned, I will be happy to send him the statement of the government with respect to Litton Industries, and he will then be entitled to draw his own conclusions.

Senator Argue: It cannot be signed yet.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not regret the timing at all—I think it was wonderful timing and I want to thank whoever is responsible for it. The people of Prince Edward Island will realize how I was able to keep prodding the government to get that money for them.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: I do not want the government leader, necessarily, to send me a copy of the statement. I know that he is a very astute member of the government; I know that he is well informed about the government—

Senator Frith: Can we make it $10 million? Do we hear $11 million?

Senator Bonnell: —and I know that he knows what agreements the government signed. Did it or did it not sign an agreement yesterday to have the Litton company come to Prince Edward Island?

Senator Roblin: I just hope that my honourable friend is as fulsome in his praise when he gets home, in telling the people of Prince Edward Island before voting day how considerate of their interests the Leader of the Government in the Senate was. It is all very well to offer these fulsome compliments here, but I would like to have them offered in a place where they really count. They do not count in here—everybody knows he is just talking. But if we heard them in Prince Edward Island, it might be more effective.

I have to admit that I am a member of the government and I have learned this much: It is usually the best policy to give information such as that which my honourable friend seeks in the words of the minister who issued the press release with respect to this matter, and that is what I will do. I will not go beyond that.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I can see now that there seems to be some doubt whether the agreement was ever signed. Otherwise, my good friend would say that yes, the government signed that agreement and that there will definitely be jobs created as a result of that. I can see now that the matter is still up in the air. I can see now that tomorrow's newspapers in Prince Edward Island will tell how Senator Lorne Bonnell and Senator Duff Roblin got the money for the potato people but that Senator Lorne Bonnell was unable to get a definite answer on this Litton plant from the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Perrault: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: I wonder if, tomorrow morning, we could read in the local papers in Prince Edward Island about how the Leader of the Government in the Senate was able to protect those eight jobs on the CNR in Charlottetown and the 225 jobs on the CNR in Moncton, so that we do not lose those jobs permanently in Atlantic Canada.

Senator Roblin: I appreciate the instinct that compels my honourable friend to conduct the Prince Edward Island election on the floor of this chamber. He would do better if he did so back in his own province, because I cannot vote in Prince Edward Island—he can, and I think his vote is pretty well known.

Senator Argue: That is not fair.

An Hon. Senator: He is undecided now.

Senator Doody: Six million certainly made a lot of difference!

Senator Roblin: I suppose I am not taking my friend's statements about me as being the absolute gospel or the last word. Perhaps he will have some reservations when he gets into the polling booth, and I will freely allow him to do that. But I think that when he does get home to Prince Edward Island, he can tell the people there that the Government of Canada is paying very close attention to their interests and they will find that as time develops they will be very satisfied with the announcement on Litton industries that was made yesterday by the Associate Minister of National Defence.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE SALE OF CN ROUTE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Edward M. Lawson: Honourable senators, flowing from Senator Bonnell's reference to the CNR, it is reported that the CN Route—

Senator Frith: Speaking of elections!

Senator Lawson: The election does not happen until next month. Wait for the results of that!

Flowing from Senator Bonnell's question respecting CNR, it is reported that CN Route, which is the trucking division of Canadian National Railways, has been sold, either in whole or in part. My question to the government leader is: Has the government or the minister responsible taken any steps to protect the jobs of the workers affected by the sale, in whole or in part, of CN Route? Second, if any jobs are to be lost, has the minister responsible taken any steps in the areas of severance pay, retraining or relocation for those workers affected?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I shall ask the Minister of Transport to communicate with the officials of Canadian National Railways to see whether the rumour referred to is correct, and, if so, what the implications of it are.

LIBYA

SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, some time ago the United States government instructed its citizens to leave Libya. The Canadian government has quite properly said that it cannot instruct our citizens to leave Libya. But when the Americans instructed their citizens to leave that country, someone in the government—and I am sure that this was done in External Affairs—must have wondered whether the Americans were acting in anticipation of trouble for their citizens. It is not very easy to tell an American from a Canadian in circumstances where bombs are falling and the mob is becoming enraged. Why did our government not take a much stronger position in advising Canadians not to go to Libya, or to leave Libya, after the Americans took that attitude with their citizens?

• (1420)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that starting on January 10 last the Prime Minister and other government people have been advising Canadians who are in Libya, in strong terms, to consider their position, to consider their safety, and to assess the advisability of their remaining in that country during these difficult times. That warning was issued not once; it was issued on a number of occasions, and one has to respect the right of the citizens of Canada who are in Libya to listen to the warnings and to make their own decisions. After all, if I am informed correctly, despite the fact that the United States government ordered its citizens out of Libya, they did not all leave. Most of the people concerned are still there, and they are still there because they must feel that their safety is not threatened. So, under those circumstances, I think the policy followed by the Canadian government is rational.

Senator Gigantès: Advising someone may not always be enough. If a friend of mine, despite all my advice against walking in front of a truck, tries to do so, then I consider it my duty to try to pull him by his coat and to be a little more emphatic.

There is another point which was raised yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition. If we say—as the Prime Minister says, and as the Deputy Prime Minister said—that we agree with “the objectives” of the Reagan administration, why, then, do we not take a much stronger line than we have taken in advising Canadian citizens, who, by staying in Libya, are helping the Libyan oil industry function and thereby fill the coffers of Mr. Khadafy, who is the paymaster and organizer of the terrorism against which the Americans have acted—an objective with which we say we agree? It sounds to me to be a contradictory position.

Senator Roblin: Well, I do not really have much hope of convincing my honourable friend that it is not a contradictory position, but I will do what I can to try. He should remember that the Government of Canada, perhaps the leader among the friends and allies of the United States, introduced measures of economic boycott with respect to oil, oil drilling and oil associated products moving to that country, so that we would not be helping them to produce their oil. But it is an entirely different matter to say that Canadian citizens should be forbidden by their government, under those circumstances, to do certain things. We asked them not to do it, and some, I suppose, have listened to that appeal. Others have exercised their rights as citizens to ignore the government. We are not a nanny. We can tell people what we think, to the best of our ability. In dire circumstances we will act; but when we have a situation where we have already entreated the citizens of the country not to go to Libya, where we have imposed economic sanctions with respect to oil production in Libya, and where up to the present time we have the assurance of the Libyan government that Canadians are safe, it seems to me that our policy is thoroughly consistent.

I should add the question my honourable friend did not ask, which is: Why is the United States allowing its oil companies to continue to move there? Ours is a consistent situation, so far as we are concerned.

Senator Gigantès: How come we embargo or prohibit the export of some equipment, but we do not make even stronger efforts to discourage the export to Libya of the most sophisticated of all equipment in the oil industry—which is, of course, a skilled Canadian technician—and which is much more useful than any piece of machinery?

Senator Roblin: Well, that is so; but if my honourable friend expects the Government of Canada to issue orders like that to our people under the present circumstances, he utterly misjudges our democracy.

Senator Gigantès: I am not expecting the government to issue orders, but I do expect the government to be unequivocal and clear, and really tell people, “You are in danger and we cannot be responsible. You have duties to your families and we will not be able to rescue you if anything goes wrong. So don’t stay there.” If we are going to be consistent in supporting the United States in its objectives, then we should tell our people to get out of there.

Senator Roblin: We have already done all the things my honourable friend has mentioned. We have entreated people not to go to Libya. But to tell me now that we should tell Canadians in Libya that they are on their own, that we will never help them, that we cannot help them if things turn worse—which they have not done so far—seems to me to be curious advice indeed to offer.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Flynn.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I hate to interrupt—

Senator Gigantès: Excuse me.

Senator Flynn: —the honourable senator’s speech—

Senator Gigantès: I have a further question.

Senator Flynn: The Speaker has recognized me.

Senator Gigantès: Your Honour, I have not finished.

Senator Frith: Is it a point of order?

Senator Flynn: Yes, on a point of order, I thought the Speaker had recognized me.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is true that I recognized Senator Flynn, but that was before Senator Gigantès rose with a further supplementary question.

An Hon. Senator: He has been at it for an hour or two!

An. Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

It is the practice of the Government of Canada to stamp Canadian passports with notices such as, “Not valid for travel to Taiwan or to North Korea.” Why did we not do that with Libya when it was obvious that hostilities might begin and put the lives of Canadians in danger?

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Your Honour, would you please impose order around here and enforce your own rulings as to the persons whom you recognize?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not intend to indulge in any further comments with respect to my honourable friend. He has exhausted the topic, and he has exhausted the patience of some of us.

DISTINGUISHED VISITOR IN GALLERY

PRESIDENT OF CANADIAN BAR ASSOCIATION

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I am not sorry to interrupt the speeches of Senator Gigantès, but at this time I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators the presence in the gallery of the President of the Canadian Bar Association, Mr. Robert Wells, Q.C., of St. John's, Newfoundland.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Flynn: Mr. Wells is well known to many of my colleagues. He has led the Legislation and Law Reform Committee of the Canadian Bar Association and has made presentations to our committees to respond to our requests on laws and proposed legislation. Last fall the CBA presented a brief on computer crime amendments to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. There have been many other occasions when the association has helped us to deal with legislation.

Honourable senators, it gives me great pleasure to mention that today, April 17, 1986, is Law Day in Canada. It is also the fourth anniversary of the proclamation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada. I want to point out to honourable senators that I mentioned the proclamation of the Charter, not of the Constitution, because to me it does not mean the same thing exactly.

To acknowledge the work of the Canadian Bar Association in promoting public legal education and information across Canada, I point out that the CBA, which represents lawyers and notaries across Canada, has joined with the Department of Justice, the Department of the Solicitor General and provincial law makers and agencies across Canada to help educate the public about our legal system and our legal institutions.

[Translation]

Canadian lawyers and notaries who are members of the Canadian Bar Association, as well as federal and provincial legislators and other institutions involved in the Canadian judicial system celebrate today the fourth anniversary of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms by launching some projects which will enable Canadians to become more familiar with their judicial system.

The Canadian Bar Association is trying to make our judicial system more readily accessible to Canadians by making speakers available to various groups, organizing the services of consulting lawyers, and offering telephone information programs.

● (1430)

[English]

As we all realize, an increased awareness of how our legal system works can make us all more free.

Honourable senators, would you please join with me in acknowledging the work of the Canadian Bar Association on this National Law Day, 1986?

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

INDUSTRY

POSSIBLE CLOSING OF ST. THOMAS, ONTARIO, FOUNDRY

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on behalf of the United Steel Workers of America concerning the purchase of a plant at St. Thomas, Ontario. This plant belonged to the Canron Inc. Foundry Division and was purchased about three months ago by Ivasco Canada Limited. At that plant, Canron manufactured, by casting, railroad car wheels and brakeshoes. The Abex Corporation of Baltimore, Maryland, U.S.A., employs 50 people and holds the patent rights for the casting of brakeshoes.

Canron at St. Thomas has been notified by the Abex Corporation that, effective September 30, 1986, no more brakeshoes will be cast in their plant in Canada. If this company cannot find replacement work for their 70 employees, there is a very strong possibility that this plant in St. Thomas will shut down.

To my knowledge, there is no other plant in Canada that manufactures railway car wheels and brakeshoes. The question is: Is the action of this American corporation to be the first result of the free trade arrangements with the United States of America?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The answer is, I hope not.

Senator Turner: I have a supplementary question. The closing down of the St. Thomas plant, and the resulting transfer of the work to the Abex Corporation in Baltimore, Maryland, will force all of our Canadian railroad companies, including CN and CP, to purchase foreign made brakeshoes. If this happens, how will a free trade arrangement protect Canadian jobs, especially considering the large difference in the U.S. and Canadian dollar values?

Senator Roblin: I think it should be the other way around. If the Canadian-U.S. dollar values remain the way they are, it gives a decided advantage to manufacturers in Canada as opposed to importing from the United States as far as foreign exchange is concerned.

I am sure my honourable friend would not expect me to comment on a commercial decision of which I have no knowledge.

Senator Turner: I have a further supplementary. Is the Leader of the Government suggesting that we close this plant down and put 70 more people on the street?

Senator Roblin: I do not want to put anyone on the street. I want more jobs in Canada, and I can tell my honourable friend that, since this government came into office, very nearly half a million new jobs have been added to the Canadian register.

Senator Turner: Part-time jobs, though.

Senator Roblin: No, not all of them part-time. Most of them full-time and the increase in employment among women and youth has been particularly noticeable.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

DISPARAGING REMARKS BY CONSERVATIVE M.P.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate and relates to a question of privilege which was raised in the other place by the Honourable Carlo Rossi, the member for Bourassa, in connection with a slur being levelled at him by a government supporter by the name of Gilles Bernier, the member for Beauce.

This is the second time that such an incident has happened in the other place. A few weeks ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether he would make a statement disassociating himself from the members of his party who make such statements, or whether he would ask the Prime Minister to do so, in order to reassure Canadians who are members of minority groups that the leadership of the Conservative Party does not tolerate such slurs and such prejudice.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not think there is any question about the attitude of the leadership of the Conservative Party with respect to racism or prejudicial remarks about people of another origin. It is perfectly clear that we value highly the contribution made to the country and to our Parliament by people who have ethnic backgrounds of the kind to which my friend refers. There is no question about that.

The question is one of discipline in the House of Commons, over which I, myself, have no control whatsoever. If it makes my honourable friend feel any better, and I hope it will, I will undertake to convey his views to the Speaker of the House of Commons, who really is the one responsible for discipline in that chamber.

Senator Bosa: Honourable senators, it is not within the purview of the Speaker of the House of Commons to instil this kind of discipline. Rather, it is the psychology that prevails among some members on the back benches of government, and it is to there that the honourable gentleman should address his recommendation.

Senator Roblin: If I had to be responsible for the psychological inclinations of all of the members of the House of Commons, or of the Senate, I would find myself in a pretty busy spot.

Senator Flynn: Our admiration for Italians goes back to John Caboto.

Senator Roblin: My admiration goes back to Chaesari Alberti, who was one of my ancestors. I may say to my honourable friend that I, too, am concerned in this issue, but I think my honourable friend is approaching it from the wrong angle.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator Bosa: I made no reference to the honourable gentleman because I know he would not engage in such defamation. However, it would be helpful if some member of this house or some member of the other place made some intervention on behalf of minority groups.

ALBERTA

THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, my question is addressed to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I notice that it was his intention to take great credit for those part-time jobs that have been created by his government. I wonder if he would care to comment on the 300,000 jobs that were promised to the people of Alberta in return for the election of this government with its engine of growth, and draw his attention to the fact that, on May 8, we are going to have a provincial election in Alberta.

Perhaps, as Senator Bonnell did, I should try my luck and ask him whether the government is giving consideration to relaxing the PGRT, a proposal supported by the members of the provincial Conservative Party in Alberta?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think our big mistake—if indeed it was a mistake—in referring to the 300,000 jobs is that we relied on the estimates that had been provided over the years by some of our old friends opposite as to what was going to happen to the price of oil.

Senator Frith: That is a real trick shot.

Senator Argue: But not one of your better efforts.

Senator Frith: As an effort, it was a good one.

Senator Roblin: That is called putting a little English on the ball. However that may be, my honourable friend asked a question about the PGRT. I can tell him only this: the Government of Canada has been conducting a series of consultations with all of the energy ministers in Canada, and with the industry itself, to examine this situation in order to see whether there are any constructive measures we feel we can take under the present circumstances to help in this situation because we want to be helpful. However, I must confess that we have not as yet arrived at a policy determination.

Hon. H. A. Olson: I have a supplementary question. Is it not true that the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate and many members of his party had a complete program of all the great things they intended to do for Alberta if certain action was taken? I wonder whether they have lost the book, or were they unconvinced when they wrote it that there was any truth in it?

Senator Frith: They have gone back to our book.

Senator Roblin: I think we are going to have to get out some of the mega-project promises of my honourable friend and compare them with ours.

BORROWING AUTHORITY BILL, 1986-87

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-99, intituled: "An Act to provide borrowing authority".—
(Honourable Senator MacEachen, P.C.).

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we are grateful to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate for providing us with information on the bill and the surrounding financial implications. I do not intend to repeat all of the information which he gave, except to say that the bill does indeed seek authority to borrow for the fiscal year 1986-87 a total of $22.6 billion. That is the first bite for this fiscal year. One never knows whether there will be a second bite. That is dependent upon a number of factors, including the revenue impact of a decrease in the price of oil and including possible tax changes that might be undertaken, for example, as a result of the representations which were made a moment ago by Senator Olson.

● (1440)

For the fiscal year 1985-86, we approved two borrowing authority bills, the first in the amount of $12 billion and the second in the amount of $18.2 billion, which, with the non-lapsing reserve carried from the Borrowing Authority Act for 1984-85, provides a total authority for 1985-86 in the amount of $32.6 billion.

It is not unusual to have more than one borrowing authority bill introduced in a single fiscal year, or related to a single fiscal year. That has happened in the past, including the fiscal year 1985-86. We know that these bills are at least annual submissions to Parliament, and that sometimes they come before Parliament more than once in a single year.

I have taken a look at a number of borrowing bills which I introduced when I was Minister of Finance. I wished to recall to mind the trend in borrowing—particularly as a result of the world recession which affected every industrialized country, a recession which had a very deep impact on the Canadian economy. For the fiscal year 1980-81, the Minister of Finance sought borrowing authority in the amount of $12 billion. That was before the recession, before the decline in revenues and before the additional burden that was imposed upon the country as a result of that recession.

During the following fiscal year, 1981-82, borrowing authority was sought in the amount of $14 billion, including a non-lapsing contingent amount of $3 billion. So, for those two fiscal years, the amounts were $12 billion and $14 billion.

In the subsequent fiscal year, we saw more clearly the impact of the recession upon the financial requirements; the first borrowing bill sought borrowing authority for $6.6 billion, and the second secured borrowing authority in the amount of $7 billion.

It so happened that before completion of the fiscal year 1982-83 my successor, Mr. Lalonde, introduced two additional borrowing authority bills, the first seeking authority for $4 billion, the second seeking authority for $5 billion.

It is a fact—and maybe it has no particular comparative value—that the total amount of borrowing authority secured from Parliament for the fiscal year 1982-83 is identical to the amount which is being sought in this borrowing authority bill, namely, $22.6 billion. When one asks what accounted for the explosion in the amount of borrowing authority sought from 1980-81 to 1982-83, an increase from $12 billion to $22.6 billion, of course the explanation is not an explosion in expenditures; it is the impact of the recession upon the Canadian economy, upon the revenues and upon the expenditure picture.

It is obviously worth drawing attention to the fact that we are in the midst of a recovery which is taking place not only in Canada, but which is taking place in all of the industrialized economies of the world; a recovery driven by the spectacular growth, relative to previous years, that has been maintained in the United States. Without the growth in the United States, the most dynamic economy in the world, the economy with the greatest impact, of course the picture would be different, not only in Europe, but in Japan and Canada.

It is entirely the case that various industrialized countries are able to deal more effectively with the problem of fiscal deficits, because of improved growth and increased revenue.

In a speech which I made some months ago in the Senate I attempted to excite some debate on what I considered to be—at least if one examines conventional wisdom—the anomaly of substantial growth taking place in the United States alongside the continued existence of very high fiscal deficits. The deficit for this fiscal year is enormous. If the Gramm-Rudman formula is applied, it will be reduced. Nevertheless, one always asks whether the view which many of us have expressed—namely, that fiscal deficits impact adversely on economic growth—still applies. One has to at least ask that question.

I think I put on the record statistics for Canadian performance that indicate, despite increases in the deficit—for example, in the years 1983 and 1984—that Canada did, itself, experience significant growth. In other words, the momentum of the growth was so strong that the existence of deficits did not seem to thwart it in any sense. I am not arguing that it is not important to deal with deficits. There are very strong administrative reasons why it is important that maximum flexibility be maintained within the expenditure program of any government. Flexibility, of course, can be assisted by lessening the total outlays which are dedicated to both principal and interest payments on the debt.

So, I just make these comments by way of attempting to relate the existence of deficits to economic growth and administrative flexibility.

● (1450)

We will presumably be borrowing $22.6 billion—maybe more—from the capital markets of the country and maybe some abroad, but not an awful lot in terms of the requirements.

I was struck last month by a comment which the Prime Minister made in reply to a question in the House of Commons when he was asked whether new youth programs were to be introduced. The question was asked by Mr. Riis, who said:

Mr. Speaker, in the quote I read the Prime Minister said that new programs, specifically, would be announced by the end of the fiscal year. It is the new programs I am asking about.

and so on.

The Prime Minister makes some preliminary comments and then says:

I know that unless you are throwing borrowed money at a problem, it does not constitute an initiative or anything of value to the Liberals and NDP. That is not our way of—

Presumably of doing business. Well, I believe if the Prime Minister did reflect upon the implications of his own statement, he would have realized that this would put the government in a total straitjacket because no expenditure change, no tax change, can be undertaken without an impact upon the deficit and upon the financial requirements.

The fact of the matter is that a number of initiatives undertaken by the present government will be financed by "borrowed money," in the sense in which the Prime Minister spoke about it. We know that one of the major items in the government's plan was the measure announced in the 1985 budget, the $500,000 capital gain exemption. The budget papers show that for 1986-87 this measure will cost the government $600 million. This is a reduction in revenue, obviously, which has an impact upon the total revenue picture, upon the financial requirements, and upon the borrowing of the country. This is quite apart from what I find to be the unacceptability of this particular measure on its merit. It does, of course, fly in the face of the Prime Minister's statement that that is not the way that he would do business.

Another example is the changes in corporate taxes. The budget paper entitled "The Fiscal Plan," tells us the changes in the corporate taxation measures will cost the government, in the fiscal year 1986-87, about $540 million. Well, that is a reduction in revenue. That is an increase—other things remaining the same—in the financial requirements, and an increase in borrowed money. So, I think that one has to be rather careful in commenting about borrowing in relation to the present government and the former government. I would think that had the Prime Minister been in a more reflective frame of mind than he was during the Question Period, it is likely that he would not have made that comment.

Honourable senators, when I spoke on the borrowing bill of 1985-86 it was quite a different kind of speech from the one I am making now. The reason, of course, was that those of us on this side took exception to the fact that we were being asked to approve a borrowing authority in the absence of the tabling of the spending estimates of the government.

In this case the situation is totally different. We have the budget, we have the spending estimates, and there are no difficulties, in principle, certainly, in approving this bill very quickly. So, I will not repeat the arguments made on that occasion, except to say that the bill did go to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance and that the committee concluded that the Senate should remain reluctant to approve a borrowing bill for a fiscal year for which the spending estimates had not been provided. I believe that was a sound position to take and I believe that the government deserves credit that it is not asking Parliament to approve a borrowing bill in the circumstances we faced last year.

But in that speech, honourable senators, I did refer to the increased burden of taxation on the Canadian people. I made the following comment in June of 1985:

... the government did not receive from the Canadian people a mandate to increase massively the tax burden. Not only did the government not have any such mandate from the public but it also concealed very carefully from the public its intention in this direction.

That is the end of my statement of June of 1985.

We have heard a great deal from the government about the specifics of its mandate and that it had put before the people of Canada certain proposals, it had won the election, and therefore it had a mandate to implement that approved electoral program. But, certainly among the miscellany of programs put before the Canadian people, there was not a proposal to increase massively the tax burden on the public.

It is a fact that although the government is attempting to argue that its deficit reduction comes from expenditure reduction, the fact of the matter is that a massive tax grab does exist. In the 1986 budget paper, "The Fiscal Plan," there was shown the following: a 3 per cent across the board surtax that will raise $560 million in 1986-87; a 1 per cent increase in the federal sales tax rates, $815 million; increases in alcohol and tobacco taxes of $150 million. These taxes will leave no Canadian untouched. They will lift from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer $1.5 billion in 1986-87. And, in the subsequent year, these tax increases will remove from the pockets of the Canadian taxpayer $2.25 billion. That is a very large tax increase. It is masked and does not include the additional taxes which were imposed in the 1985 budget.

● (1500)

It also is a fact that the tax burden is not distributed fairly. It strikes hardest at the poor and the middle class while offering generous tax benefits to the well-off. One cannot make that utterance without repeating again that the capital gains tax exemption, which still remains, is now one of the scars of the Canadian tax system.

Honourable senators, we all recall the 1986 budget, since it is not that far away in our memories. We recall that it was intended to restore the confidence of overseas investors in Canada, confidence that had been eroded and that had been recognized as such by the Minister of Finance and by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

One asks whether the budget did have its intended effect of increasing confidence abroad in the performance of the Canadian economy, and whether it has increased the confidence of the market in the government's management of the Canadian economy.

Before dealing with this more fully, I should like to quote a statement made by the present Minister of Finance in June 1984, a statement which had to do with the value of the Canadian currency; the adverse impact, in his mind, of the decrease in the value of the Canadian currency; and what steps the government of the day ought to take to reverse the decrease in the value of the Canadian currency. In Hansard of June 26, 1984, Mr. Wilson is reported as having said:

Canadians are seeing the cost of the low dollar in their food, vacations, cars which they buy from abroad, clothing, television sets, gasoline, and virtually everything. The cost of financing the Government's borrowing overseas has increased over $1 billion as a result of the recent decline in the dollar. Does the Minister regard the current exchange crisis with a sense of urgency? Is he determined to bring in policies which will attack the situation, or are we going to see a long drift through this summer in which nothing will happen and the dollar will go as low as 70 cents or 75 cents?

What was the value of the Canadian dollar when this cry of urgency was made by the present Minister of Finance? The dollar was worth 76.15 cents U.S., a level not even in the wildest dreams of the present government; a level not even contemplated by the present Minister of Finance. At that time, however, he found it an urgent question for the incumbent government. Furthermore, far from falling further and contrary to the expectations of Mr. Wilson, the dollar stabilized through the summer and actually closed at almost 77 cents U.S. on September 4, 1984, election day.

We are constantly reminded, particularly by the Minister of State for Finance in the House of Commons, of the legacy of the former government. I am thankful to the deputy leader that he excised that part of the speech made in the House of Commons by the Minister of Finance which referred to this legacy. However, while the legacy in some cases was good and in other cases probably could have been better, particularly in terms of economic growth which was, as I said, affected by the world recession, nevertheless, at least one legacy was pretty good in relative terms, and that was a Canadian dollar worth about 77 cents U.S.

Senator Frith: Part of the bare cupboard.

Senator MacEachen: What has occurred since then? And have the policies of Mr. Wilson and this government improved the situation? We know that on November 7, 1984, the day before Mr. Wilson's economic statement, the dollar closed at 76.22 cents U.S., down over two thirds of a cent since the election. We then had the economic statement and we asked how the financial community viewed it. Within the week, the dollar fell one-quarter of a cent to close at 75.98 cents U.S. on November 14, 1984.

During the next six months, the policies brought in to attack the problem had a dramatic effect on the exchange rate. The dollar fell over three cents to close at 72.85 cents U.S. on the day of the government's first budget.

These policies which the current Minister of Finance urged when he was in opposition and just on the threshold of office, and which he introduced in a little over eight months, had effected a decline in the value of the Canadian currency of four cents U.S.

We all remember the events before the budget of February 26. We know of the brutal treatment the Canadian currency was receiving on the international markets. We know of the crisis statement made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in committee about the situation and about the lack of confidence which the international community has in the Canadian economy. These are not my words; these words were used by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in explaining why the Canadian dollar was being battered and savaged on the international markets.

On February 4, 1986, the dollar closed at 69.24 cents U.S. When in opposition, Mr. Wilson was concerned that the dollar might fall below 75 cents U.S. We know that under his stewardship and under his tender care, the dollar fell to under 70 cents. In February, there was concern that it might go below 65 cents.

We know how that was averted. Massive borrowings were undertaken by the banking authorities; there was intervention in the market; and all the weight possible was put to shore up the value of the Canadian dollar by market intervention, not by brilliant new policies. On budget day, the dollar closed at 71.68 cents U.S., and on April 15 it closed at 71.90. In the intervening time, it again fell below the 70-cent level.

I suppose that one can make two comments: How easy it is to prescribe when in the opposition; and how difficult it is to perform when in government. The value of the currency which Mr. Wilson found so unacceptable in 1984 has decreased even further, hovering at about 71 or 72 cents, with no assurance that it will have a stable future. I can only repeat the questions which the present Minister of Finance so pointedly asked in 1984. Since the date of the general election, the Canadian dollar has fallen 4.32 cents. I wonder whether the minister has made any calculations as to the resulting cost to Canadians in the form of higher prices for food, vacations, foreign cars, clothing, television sets and so on. Have any studies been made by the present Minister of Finance of the impact of the decline in the value of the Canadian currency? How much has the decline in the value of the dollar cost the Canadian government in financing its borrowings abroad?

● (1510)

We recall that he told us in 1984 that the cost of financing the government's borrowing overseas had increased over $1 billion as a result of the recent decline in the dollar. I wonder whether he can provide figures for the cost in the period of his stewardship as the Minister of Finance? These were points raised by the minister and it may be that when the bill goes to committee, or later, we will have an opportunity to secure this information.

Having made those points, honourable senators, we are quite prepared, as I said earlier, to give the bill second reading and have it go to committee so that any questions which I or others may have can be asked and the bill can be returned for third reading at an early date.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as one might expect, I intend to put a considerably more optimistic gloss on the finances of the Canadian nation than that indicated by the comments made by my honourable friend, which seem to me to be weighted in the direction of pessimism and of complaint. Well, there is always plenty to complain about in financial management, so I do not fault him for that. But I think there are a number of points that lead us to a much more optimistic conclusion as to the state of our nation than does the information he has given us this afternoon.

I am naturally pleased to know that he proposes to support second reading, but I am a little bit gun-shy. He supported second reading of Bill C-11 some time ago, but when it got to committee I found out that supporting second reading of a bill was a good deal different from passing it. I just hope that this expression of co-operation—which I welcome—carries forward to the committee stage as well. While I have no objection to a close examination of this legislation—indeed, it is the duty of senators to examine these bills in as much detail as they choose—I think it is also our duty to pass them, because they are public bills, financial bills and government bills, and a body that is not elected, that represents nobody and is responsible to nobody should be very careful about standing in the way of the financial operations of the Government of Canada. That said, all the good advice, warnings and observations that senators wish to offer, they are entirely free to offer. I welcome such observations and will do my best to deal with those that require some comment from the members on the government side.

My honourable friend rather surprised me by starting off with a reference to his own experience as a “budgeteer.” There were episodes in that record to which he alluded this afternoon, but he did not get into it very deeply. He discussed the question of deficits and the estimates that were his responsibility in connection with the public finances. What is remarkable about them is that, whatever the reason was, he excused himself by referring to the state of the economy at the time. The same observations apply to any minister of finance. Whether in a boom or a depression, the state of the economy has to be taken into account when informing Parliament of financial affairs.

I notice that in 1982-83, the deficit projected was $9,260,000,000, but, when all the chips were in, it was $25,250,000,000. That is quite a change. That is quite an underestimate, in the first instance.

Senator MacEachen: That was all revealed in my speech.

Senator Roblin: Good for you.

Senator MacEachen: Everyone listened and understood; it was made very clear. Why repeat what has been stated?

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Roblin: The projection for 1983-84 was similarly about $9 billion, but it turned out to be over $31 billion.

Senator Perrault: You are living in the past.

Senator Roblin: Well, I am going to get to the present if you will just give me time. My honourable friend referred to these figures. I had no intention of speaking about them because—

Senator MacEachen: Well, I don't mind.

Senator Roblin:—some of these things are best forgotten.

Senator MacEachen: I don't forget.

Senator Roblin: But I simply cannot let him refer to it without bringing the attention of the house to the record.

The next year, the last year of the former Liberal administration, the deficit was supposed to be nearly $10 billion and it turned out to be almost $30 billion. So one can see that, when it comes to estimating deficits, the previous government left something to be desired.

Senator MacEachen: Just like your estimate on the price of oil. It is just about as far out.

Senator Roblin: Time will tell.

Senator MacEachen: Time has told.

Senator Roblin: Time is not over yet. We haven't finished yet.

Senator MacEachen: Time has damn well told—Mr. Getty knows about it.

Senator Roblin: There is a lot of oil to go down the pipeline before my honourable friend can talk, but I am sorry if I have touched a nerve. If he had not raised the subject, I was quite prepared to ignore it.

Senator MacEachen: Go ahead; I will be quiet.

Senator Roblin: After all, I have been a minister of finance and I know that these things are not easy. But I really felt that my honourable friend, who raised the matter, should have been more frank with us and should have given us the actual results that followed.

Senator MacEachen: Well, I did.

Senator Roblin: But what about it? What does it mean? It simply means that the biggest single problem the present administration has had to face is the control of that deficit which we inherited—and I know that members opposite do not like being reminded about it—the control of the debt to which it gave rise and, even more important, the control of the servicing costs of that debt. Those are the big issues which any minister of finance will have to take into consideration. Therefore, it is worth while to place on the record, I think, the progress that has been made.

We were faced with a situation which was without precedent in the national history of the Government of Canada. We had to do something about it. And we have. What we have done is this: We have reduced the rates of growth in these categories of expenditures so that they are now headed in the right direction.

Budgetary expenditures went up in 1984-85 by 12 per cent, in 1985-86 by 5.4 per cent and, in 1986-87, they will be 4.5 per cent. That represents getting control over some of these costs. I want to come back to that because I think the opposition has been derelict in its responsibility in dealing with this question of budget reduction and taxation increases. Here we have a situation in which we have our budgetary expenditures under control and they are coming down. As a percentage increase they are coming down and as a percentage of the gross national product they have been coming down. They have come down to 22.8 per cent, which is better than they have been for a long, long while.

Those matters, which are reflected in this borrowing request we have before us now, really represent progress. Budgetary deficits as a percentage of the gross national product have been coming down, and substantially so. They now represent 6.8 per cent of the gross national product, which is getting almost within reason. That represents the record of this administration, which is reflected in the borrowing requirements that we have before us.

These borrowing requirements, as my honourable friend who sits beside me told us the other day, represent a substantial reduction of the demand that the Canadian government is going to make on the Canadian economy—a very substantial reduction over what we experienced in the last six or seven years, the lowest point in a long time.

Senator MacEachen: Well, it is not the lowest point in a long time.

Senator Roblin: It is so; it is the lowest point in five or six years, anyway. You came up with the biggest increases ever; that is your record.

Senator MacEachen: No, that is quite untrue.

Senator Roblin: We can examine the facts.

Senator MacEachen: Well, please do.

Senator Roblin: The point is that the budgetary deficits, as a percentage of the gross national product, are coming down. That, I think, reflects some credit, but no thanks to my honourable friend. When he was in office, one of his contributions—I do not know whether he did it himself or whether it was done by another minister of finance, but anyway, he was around—had to do with the scientific research tax credit, certainly one of the most unfortunate initiatives taken by the Government of Canada. I thought I had it in front of me. Perhaps, if I scurry around a little, I will find it. It is a program which was estimated to cost $100 million. That I do recall. I think my friend will tell me that I am right on that. It was estimated to cost about $100 million. But when we got through with it, we found that the cost ran into billions of dollars—I think it is $3 billion—and if we had not had to swallow that, perhaps there would be a little more money left over for the farmers and the oil industry that my friend, Senator Olson, is concerned about. But we had to swallow that, and that was part of the reason why the finances of this country were in disarray—because we had to take care of expenditures of that kind. That money had to be borrowed.

Make no mistake about it. That money, that expenditure on research and development that turned sour, that went belly-up, we had to borrow to finance it—and that is part of our problem here; and that is something that I do not think should be overlooked at the present time.

● (1520)

Senator MacEachen: What of the borrowings to finance the capital gains tax exemptions?

Senator Roblin: Well, that may be so; but that capital gains tax exemption will produce economic benefits—a lot more than that R&D thing is going to produce—a lot more economic benefits.

Senator MacEachen: It will produce nothing.

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend can say that, but a lot of people in this country are quite satisfied with it. He doesn't like it; but I am satisfied that that policy will turn out to be a satisfactory one. Look at the total picture. This government has been trying to reduce the deficit in what way? First, by reducing public expenditures. I have given the house figures that indicate that the ratio of government expenditures to the gross national product has been declining, and the rate of increase in government expenditures has been drastically altered. It is under much tighter control than it has been before.

Some taxes have been raised. I do not ignore that fact. I wish they had not been raised. They are high, and I do not want them to get much higher. But here is the interesting thing: When we produce a recommendation for spending less money, what is the reaction of the opposition? It is, "Don't do it". I cannot think of many, if any, proposals for the reduction of expenditures that they have supported. They have always told us, "Don't do it". Whatever it is, "Don't do it. Keep on spending;" and when we have asked for increases in taxation—which is the other side of the coin—what is the response to that? It is, "Don't do it. Don't worry about it." I do not know what the rationale is.

The leader of the party, during the election, told us that the costs to government would be reduced by billions of dollars if he had his way. But on no occasion that I can recall has the government received any support from the opposition for reducing expenditures or increasing taxation. So we are entitled to conclude that if they were in office today, the record of expenditures that they establish would be pretty much the same as it has been up to now.

So our claim that we are reducing expenditures to a very large degree, compared to what they would have done, I think is one that we can fairly make. If they had come along and said "Look, we support you on these reductions," or "We support you on this tax increase," or "We support your general thrust to relieve the weight of taxes on the people of Canada by bringing our affairs into proper form," then, perhaps, there might be some hope in the situation. But they have not done any of those things. So one has to conclude that if that is their policy—and obviously it is—to keep the spending going, to keep the taxes down, we then wind up with even larger deficits and larger spending than we have now—by far.

So the claim of the present administration to have reduced expenditures more than they have increased taxation is one that I believe can be justified by people who are willing to look at the matter in a constructive way.

As to financial requirements, the total of the financial requirements listed in the amount here represents, as I have already said, a considerable decline on the demands that were previously made. They are going in the right direction. They are not satisfactory, but they are going in the right direction—and I think that point should be recognized. It is not just percentage-wise, or compared to the GNP, that they are going in the right direction, although that is true. They are going in the right direction in terms of actual dollars. The dollars are down. They are down substantially. The burden on the Canadian economy is being reduced, and the capital requirements of other sectors of the economy have a little more breathing space than they might otherwise have because of this measure. So those are all good.

But the proof of the pudding is in the eating. My honourable friend tells me that he does not like what has happened to the dollar. Perhaps he is right. We have a sort of fixation on the dollar, I guess. It seems to me to be one of the indications of economic activity to which we pay a lot of attention. Well, everybody does. We have had to support the dollar; and, as my honourable friend was good enough to say, we supported the dollar in exactly the same way he did when his government ran into troubles with foreign exchange. The Bank of Canada acted to protect the dollar, to keep interest rates up, and borrowed from other people in order to carry out their policies. That is nothing new. I do not claim any credit for that. That is the way it has been done.

Senator MacEachen: It certainly is new.

Senator Roblin: Well, when you had dollar problems, you followed exactly the same policies in trying to deal with them. Then he says to me, "What is the result of this? As a result of this dollar, what has happened to the economy?"; and he asked me what has happened about our borrowings abroad—and I think he asked me what had happened about imports. Well, he should have asked another question: What has happened to exports? That is affected by the dollar—and I have good news for my honourable friend. I can tell him that exports from this country are substantially up over what they had been in recent years. They are up over last year; they are up over the time when we came into office, by substantial amounts.

Senator MacEachen: How much?

Senator Roblin: I think I will let my honourable friend know. I have the information here somewhere, if I can find it. Let me tell him what is happening to the economy.

Senator MacEachen: What about the trade surplus? It is worsening, is it not?

Senator Roblin: I cannot deal with these sotto voce questions. I will just continue with my remarks and try to put my case before my honourable friend, in the full confidence that he will find there is some reason in it.

Senator MacEachen: You can leave me out of it.

Senator Roblin: Well, I will talk to the rest of the house. If my honourable friend has had enough, I will leave him out of it. I will not even mention him again. I will simply talk to the intelligent members of the opposition—in which I include my honourable friend—who are open to persuasion. Perhaps I cannot include him in that remark; but I will talk to the ones who I think are open to persuasion.

An Hon. Senator: They are all behind you.

Senator Roblin: Let us take, for example, the report made by the Governor of the Bank of Canada just the other day. With all of our problems in recent years with the dollar, with interest rates, and all that kind of thing, to which reference has been made, what does he say? He says that we are doing all right. He says, "The underlying economic climate improved in 1985 as consumers and businesses registered much more confidence in Canadian prospects." Is that not what we want to do? When we get through with all this talk about dollars, interest rates, and what not—things that are of importance and have to be discussed—what are we aiming for in the end? We hope that all of these factors, good and bad—because there is both—will come together to represent growth and progress; and that is what we are seeing. That is what we are seeing, and the Bank of Canada reports this in its statement concerning 1985.

I want to give some other figures; and I may get around to imports and exports—certainly exports—with respect to what has been going on since the last election.

In the 18 months since the election, there have been 574,000 new jobs developed in Canada, and unemployment has reached its lowest level in four years. That cannot be all bad. It is not all good; we are not happy with it; we want more. Of course, all of us want more. We want more jobs, and we are going to get them. But that can't be bad.

Senator Perrault: What about the west?

Senator Roblin: In the west, in the province of British Columbia—my honourable friend has my full sympathy; and if those American senators, whom we spoke of the other day, get their way, it is going to be even tougher for him, and we are going to have to fight like Billy-be-damned to protect his interests—and we are going to do our best to do so. In the oil industry we have the same kind of problem. There are thousands of jobs at risk in Alberta. We do not ignore that. But when we look at the country as a whole—and that is all I can do in an off-the-cuff extemporaneous contribution of this kind—I have to say that there have been 574,000 new jobs since we came in.

Inflation has been steady for almost two years. It is the most stable price environment since 1971. Consumer confidence is at near record levels. Retail sales have increased 14 per cent since the election. That confirms what the governor of the bank has been saying.

Senator MacEachen: They are always increasing.

Senator Roblin: New manufacturing orders are up 15.3 per cent since September, 1984. Canada's gross national product has been improving—4.5 per cent for last year, and it is going to be a substantially better year for us now, perhaps 3 per cent or 3.5 per cent, but certainly it is encouraging.

Building permits were up 26 per cent in 1985, representing an additional $4 billion in construction activity. The Bank of Canada rate has fallen by two and a quarter percentage points since the election. That is what the Bank of Canada rate has done, and it has fallen by almost two percentage points, when I take today's figures into account, since the budget. That isn't bad. Those are signs of progress.

Now exports—here we are. Exports for the first two months of 1986 were up by 8 per cent, compared to the same period in 1985, and by 22 per cent compared with the same period in 1984.

I could go on and burden the chamber with other statistics that represent signs of progress. I am not going to do it. I have found the information about the scientific research tax credit. The costs amounted to $3.4 billion, and it was supposed to cost $100 million, but we have covered that.

● (1530)

Senator Perrault: Did you speak against it?

Senator Roblin: I believed the figures given by the government. I thought $100 million was right. It turned out that it was not right.

What is the point of all this? I do not think it is to dwell—although perhaps I am guilty of it—on recriminations. Things have happened, and there are explanations. I may not like the explanations. I simply wanted to record some of the facts, and I hope that I have been reasonably accurate in doing so. I do not claim perfection. I may have made some mistakes, but I do not think I have made too many. I am not really too anxious to blow the government's horn, although I have been doing that, too. What I am really concerned about in this chamber in particular is, is the nation moving ahead? Are we able to learn from our mistakes? Are we able to do things a little better, not that this administration has any monopoly on brains, intelligence or initiatives, because it has not. However, it learns from its mistakes and it is trying to do better. That I think is what the country is doing. We are trying to do better. We have had difficulties. Other men have had to struggle with some of those difficulties that I have not had to struggle with, and I respect their efforts. I am not trying to belittle anybody on that account. I acknowledge that things were not easy, that they were very difficult.

I would like to see the same recognition extended to what we are doing. We are not going to do everything right. There are going to be problems, and we are not going to be able to solve all of them as we would wish. But we as senators, as Canadians, as people with no political affiliation can say that we are digging ourselves out of a hole we have gotten into ourselves, that we are making some progress. Things are moving ahead. In this bill before us today, there is some crystalization of that progress because we are asking for less money for our deficit, and we are asking for less money from the people of Canada to support this government and to support our public affairs. We are doing so on the basis that we are making some progress and that we think that the economy will continue to move ahead in a constructive way.

I would like to close on a conciliatory note. I do not really want to—

Senator MacEachen: You want the bill, I guess.

Senator Roblin: I want the bill all right.

Senator MacEachen: That is why we are getting the conciliatory comments.

Senator Roblin: If I do not offer a few kind words I may not get the bill, so I have to be a little careful here.

What I want to say is that in spite of differences that separate us, and they do, perhaps on policy and perhaps sometimes on fact, and in spite of the fact that none of us is perfect and we all make mistakes—and there are more to come, I am sure of that, life being what it is—we can take some satisfaction in the fact that we are moving ahead. That is the only point I want to make. On that basis, this request for second reading of this bill deserves support.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not wish to make a speech. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government a question, if I may be permitted to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Move an amendment, please. I would like to make another speech.

Senator Perrault: He feels a speech coming on.

Senator Olson: If I thought it would do any good or would serve any useful purpose, I would do so.

I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether or not he feels that this government is responsible for all areas of the country? That question may seem elementary, but near the end of his speech he commented that the government takes a great deal of satisfaction out of the improvements that have been made since they came to office. Would the leader apply that comment to the agricultural industry and the energy industry in Alberta and Saskatchewan? Is that the view of the government with respect to the change in the economy over the last 18 months?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, that is a reasonable question and I am glad to answer it, because I think it bears on a very important point. I do not think that any politician should take the credit entirely to himself for improvements in the economy, because anyone with a brain and some common sense knows that that would be an improper thing to do. The economy is much more than the government, thank goodness. The economy consists of the efforts and labour of people all over the place. All the government can do is to try to create an atmosphere in which these people can do their best, to create an atmosphere in which those who fall out of the productive cycle are protected from the difficulties in which they find themselves, usually through no fault of their own. The role of government is not absolute. The government can be of assistance to the economy. The government is essential, and it has a duty to protect those who cannot protect themselves and a duty to so order its affairs that people in the private sector can say to themselves, "We have confidence that things are going in the right direction, confidence in our economy, confidence in our country and confidence in ourselves." That is what makes jobs and that is what makes progress. My claim is that the government is doing its best to establish the climate of opinion in which all can prosper.

Senator Olson: I expect that the government also believes that it has to view the consequences of whatever happens after it has set down guidelines for the private sector. Is the leader taking satisfaction from what has happened in Alberta and Saskatchewan, in the economic performance of the past 18 months? He has used such terms as, he "takes satisfaction in", he "views with satisfaction", and "digging ourselves out of the difficulty." It would be interesting for people in that part of the country to know whether or not this is the attitude of this government with respect to taking a good hard look at the economic performance of the past 18 months, since this government has been setting the guidelines for the various sectors.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, evidently my honourable friend is asking me a question, and I shall try to furnish him with a reply. He is continuing in this discussion with the points that he made—

Senator Olson: We do not think that the record is very good, and that is why I am asking you if you wish to apply it. That is all.

Senator Roblin: I shall do my best to answer my honourable friend, if he will give me a chance. He is continuing to make the entirely valid points that he made in his contribution to the budget debate a little while ago, that the oil industry is in trouble, and that is as plain as the nose on my face.

Senator Olson: And the agricultural industry.

Senator Roblin: He can also add that the agricultural industry, particularly in western Canada, is in trouble. There is no question about it. In spite of those things, I have tried to disclose the overall record. That does not mean that we take any satisfaction or that we will sit on our hands while these other problems develop. However, the government does not control the price of oil, nor do we control the price of wheat. We are not the prime actors in those markets. We have to fall into the role of those who are trying to assist to alleviate the problem as it affects those who are facing it. That is what we are going to do. As I said the other day, we have provided over $1 billion to the western agricultural industry from the stabilization fund, which is one third of their money and two thirds government money, and we have put other funds into agricultural assistance, as I outlined the other day and which I will not repeat now. I have also said—or if I have not said it before, I shall say it now—that we abolished the National Energy Policy. We substantially reduced by billions of dollars taxation to the oil industry, and we were highly criticized at the time for reducing the taxes in the way we did. We are glad that we went ahead and did so, because at the present time, those taxes would be insupportable if they were still in effect and had been raised, because the people in the oil industry who were benefiting from it are not the same people who were paying the tax, which were largely the small Canadian companies in the west, although I admit that others had their part in it. I am not trying to say that all is well. We know that it is not. I am merely trying to say that we have not been sitting back doing nothing, that we recognize the problem and that we have to face the fact that if it continues and gets worse further demands will be made upon the Government of Canada in an effort to be of assistance.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, about all that can be drawn from the leader's comments is that the government is fairly proud of its record of performance and that the people in those industries in the western provinces can expect more of the same from this government.

Senator Roblin: The people out there can expect more jobs. They can expect a continuing increase in the GNP. They can expect a continuing stability in the degree of inflation and a continuing decline in the interest rates in Canada. Then they will all be a lot better off. However, that does not mean that there are not areas of this country which will have a devil of a time in the next couple of years, and we do not overlook that and we do not intend to abandon them.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, may I inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I do not wish to take up much more of your time. I just want to cash in on this feeling of tranquility, conciliation and peace that prevails in the Senate chamber and try to gather in all of that support for second reading that I detected during the discussions.

● (1540)

First of all, I want to try, if I can, to answer a question raised by Senator Stewart yesterday. I am appreciative of his constant attendance at the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. I recognize the fact that he will be unable to be with us on Monday evening, so I made an inquiry as to the $2 billion and where it comes from and how it is arrived at. I am told that the $2 billion extra really gives a borrowing capacity to the government of $24.6 billion. This is the total result of $2 billion from the last borrowing authority plus the $22.6 billion that we have in this authority, and it has the effect of carrying forward a $2 billion authority to each successive year as it goes through. Any amount in excess of the $22.6 billion plus the extra $2 billion will lapse, but that $2 billion will always be there as a cushion.

Clause 3 of the bill states that any unused borrowing authority granted by the bill, or by the previous Borrowing Authority Act, 1984-85 (No. 2), to the extent that the unused authority exceeds $2 billion, will be cancelled on March 31, 1987.

Thus, similar to previous years, this clause preserves a $2 billion non-lapsing reserve, if it is available. That is, if it has not already been spent. In any event, the total will not exceed the $22.6 billion plus the $2 billion, if it is available, to be carried forward into the 1987-88 fiscal year. However, it does not permit any of the $2 billion reserve granted by the borrowing authority last year to be carried beyond this current fiscal year.

Honourable senators, that is the explanation as I received it. Senator Leblanc has undertaken to raise this matter with the officials at the meeting of the committee on Monday evening to get a more comprehensive answer, but I thought I should raise it here today because Senator Stewart had asked for it.

Hon. John B. Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I appreciate the answer that has been given. There is one point on which I am still uncertain. Senator Doody has told us that there was a $2 billion borrowing authority that was carried forward from the previous fiscal year. That would be over and above the new borrowing authority which is now sought. Am I to understand, then, that without coming back to Parliament for a new borrowing authority, the government, in the current fiscal year, could borrow the amount sought in this bill, plus the $2 billion which is authorized by the carry-over? The result, of course, would be that there would be no carry-over for the next fiscal year, but that the amount borrowed would be $24.6 billion.

Senator Doody: Yes, senator. That coincides with my understanding exactly. The clause preserves that $2 billion non-lapsing reserve.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I apologize belatedly for the fact that members must continue to sit. I welcome the opportunity to proceed with some remarks on the report tabled on Tuesday by Senator Tremblay, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

I read with interest the remarks made by Senator Everett in the debate. I feel I owe him a word of congratulation on what he had to say and the critique which he offered on the report. My remarks may be repetitive in relation to those of Senator Everett, but I feel it my duty, as Chairman of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, to place them on the record.

As honourable senators are aware, the report dealt with the examination of the activities of the National Film Board with respect to the production and distribution of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". The examination of the film was delegated to the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, which I have the honour to chair.

I feel it appropriate to include in my introduction the fact that the film, which created a high level of controversy, revolves around the question of the "heroism" of World War I ace, Billy Bishop, and more particularly the casting of doubt on his being awarded the Victoria Cross, the highest recognition of bravery awarded to members of the forces.

Although a minority of members supported stronger recommendations, the report tabled on Tuesday recommends that a detailed disclaimer be attached to the National Film Board production, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". There are at least four legitimate grounds for criticizing the film. I shall touch upon them briefly, because Senator Everett referred to them yesterday.

1. The historical contentiousness of the suggestion that Billy Bishop's record was substantially fraudulent.

2. The film techniques used to convey and reinforce this suggestion.

3. The existence of many errors of fact and chronology in the film and its transcript.

4. The description of the film in promotional material as a full-length documentary.

Honourable senators, my involvement in the exercise came about not because of Billy Bishop himself or the story of Billy Bishop, but primarily because of my interest in all the veterans of Canada. I have directed a great deal of attention towards protecting their rights over the years to ensure that Canada fulfils its commitment to veterans which was made to each and every one of them by the Prime Minister of the day in 1917, whether they were heroes or not.

My attention to the issue itself arose out of the efforts of our colleague, Senator Molson, a distinguished veteran, a Battle of Britain pilot and a friend of Billy Bishop. Senator Molson, in this particular case, and rightly so, set out to defend the record, the reputation and the rights of a comrade with whom he served in World War II. Coincidentally, when the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs was established and, as a result of the prominence of Senator Molson's interest, I suggested to him that the formation of the subcommittee could afford him the opportunity, if he so desired, to introduce a motion to refer this matter to that committee to examine the subject, and he did so. I make reference to these facts to emphasize that, although it is my privilege to lead off the debate, which was interrupted yesterday, Senator Molson's initiative deserves the fullest recognition for his conscientious efforts, even though he was not a member of the committee. I commend him for those efforts, for his support, for his advice and his guidance to me as we progressed in our deliberations.

I also wish to thank Senator Tremblay for the freedom that he gave me in dealing with the subject. I also wish to give thanks to Senator Bonnell, Deputy Chairman of the committee, the members of the committee, the staff, Mr. Grant Purves who wrote the report, the two clerks of the committee, Diane Deschamps and Denis Bouffard and to Gordon Lovelace, the director of operations who was very instrumental in generating some publicity on the issue.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, as I indicated, my interest in the exercise was not because of Billy Bishop himself; my interest in the matter was because of what he did as one of the many thousands of veterans who distinguished themselves during times of war.

I want to emphasize my feelings by putting on the record the following extracts from the Canada Gazette, 4th Supplement, dated 10 August, 1917, page 910.

While I have indicated that my interest was not particularly in Billy Bishop, as we progressed in our deliberations I became more and more immersed in the Billy Bishop story.

The first citation I want to put on the record relates to Billy Bishop. It states:

His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to approve of the award of the Victoria Cross to the under-mentioned officer:—

Captain William Avery Bishop, D.S.O., M.C., Canadian Cavalry and Royal Flying Corps. For most conspicuous bravery, determination and skill, Captain Bishop, who had been sent out to work independently, flew first of all to an enemy aerodrome; finding no machine about, he flew on to another aerodrome about three miles south-east, which was at least twelve miles the other side of the line. Seven machines, some with their engines running, were on the ground. He attacked these from about fifty feet, and a mechanic, who was starting one of the engines, was seen to fall. One of the machines got off the ground, but at a height of sixty feet Captain Bishop fired fifteen rounds into it at very close range, and it crashed to the ground.

A second machine got off the ground, into which he fired thirty rounds at 150 yards range, and it fell into a tree.

Two more machines then rose from the aerodrome. One of these he engaged at the height of 1,000 feet, emptying the rest of his drum of ammunition. This machine crashed 300 yards from the aerodrome, after which Captain Bishop emptied a whole drum into the fourth hostile machine, and then flew back to his station.

[Senator Marshall.]

Four hostile scouts were above him for about a mile of his return journey, but they would not attack.

His machine was very badly shot about by machine gun fire from the ground.

I refer to this citation because it gives an indication of a recommendation made not by Billy Bishop, since he worked independently and was allowed to work independently. His commanding officer must have given the version of what happened.

Keep in mind, honourable senators, that doubt is cast in the film over this particular alleged heroic action itself. We should also remember that Bishop earned for conspicuous bravery, besides the Victoria Cross, two Distinguished Service Orders, the Military Cross, the Distinguished Flying Cross and many other foreign decorations.

It is also recorded that there were other deeds of bravery carried out by Bishop for which he did not get recognition. Did the producer question these?

So, we ask the question: Given that there is doubt of his V.C. exploit, is it fair to blot out some 70 or 60 or less victories and to destroy the authenticity of his other awards and those of thousands of other heroes to satisfy a questionable purpose for producing a film? For what purpose?

I should like to point out also that on the same page of the Canada Gazette of 1917 there are 15 other citations on awards for conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty for servicemen of all ranks, and two of these are worthy of mention. One refers to a Lance Corporal H. Snape, Regimental Number 424448, Infantry. The citation states:

For conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty. When all his officers had become casualties, he took command of his company and showed great ability and initiative in controlling them under heavy hostile fire. He afterwards displayed the greatest courage and determination in leading bombing attacks and inflicting heavy loss on the enemy. His example to the men was splendid. He has been twice previously noted for his gallantry and distinguished conduct.

Honourable senators, are we now to cast doubt on whether or not Lance Corporal H. Snape was faking, or that his commanding officer was creating a hero because we needed heroes, as some of these expert journalists say? Are his parents or his family now going to wonder if their pride is ill-founded?

The next citation relates to Private I. F. Wismer, Regimental Number 81982, Infantry, and it states:

For conspicuous gallantry and devotion to duty. Assisted by "another man"—

Another man!

—he succeeded in capturing an enemy machine gun which was causing us casualties. Later, he entered a dug-out and took three officers and four other ranks prisoners.

Private Wismer was probably only 17 or 18 years of age. Honourable senators, are we now to wonder if Private Wismer, or this "other man" whom we have never heard of and perhaps never will, did what we have been told they did! What about their heroism? Is there doubt?

What do we now tell those young Canadians about the horrors of war whom we encouraged to view Bishop and others like him as heroes? Do we tell them now to view them as not being worthy of our respect and admiration, but as cheats and pawns interested solely in their own glory? Were their awards given out by drawing lots, as one of our famous historians of Canada has said? Is this what it was all about? Is this what we were taught to believe in?

Honourable senators, unfortunately the process we follow allows the danger of fall-out, commonly known as leaks in the channels of communication from one level of a committee to another. I refer to the preparation of the report and the dealing with it by two committees.

In this case, a report was produced by the writer, Mr. Grant Purves of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. After I presented the report to the subcommittee, some changes were suggested. As well, three recommendations were proposed, of which only one was accepted by the subcommittee. That was the democratic right and the consensus of the committee.

In order to avoid confusion in the public's mind because of the leak which resulted in the printing of the three recommendations in a Toronto newspaper, I feel it my duty to place the three recommendations on the record. They are as follows:

1. that the film be withdrawn from circulation or
2. that the film be re-edited to eliminate its unproven allegations or
3. that a disclaimer be added or attached to its title saying that it is a docu-drama, combining reality and fiction.

I feel it should be recorded also that enthusiastic debate followed, with the consensus in favour of recommendation 3 by the subcommittee, and after similar action, by the main committee, as follows:

RECOMMENDATION

That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added:

"This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne".

Some members felt and still feel that this recommendation does not go far enough.

Honourable senators, the other two recommendations, as I outlined earlier, did not gain acceptance by the committees. I mentioned these two because they were a reflection of the vast majority of the veterans across the country, represented by recognized organizations, as well as by many hundreds of individuals closely related to veterans. I mention two of the most prominent organizations. Honourable senators are aware that the Royal Canadian Air Force Association was very prominent because of its admiration of Billy Bishop. This is what they urged the committee to do, just to give you an idea of the feeling across the country:

1. That all prints of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" be immediately recalled by the NFB, including internegs, outcuts, rough cuts, etcetera.
2. That the above material be destroyed in order to prevent any duplication or distribution of this material, by anyone for any reason.
3. That the NFB be admonished, in the strongest terms possible, regarding the production of any material that changes or alters the records or accomplishments of any Canadian, living or dead.

Just two examples of the feelings of the comrades of Billy Bishop and the veterans across the country.

● (1600)

I would also like to refer to a resolution placed before the Dominion Command of the Royal Canadian Legion at a recent convention. It says this:

Whereas Air Marshal Billy Bishop, V.C. remains one of Canada's great heroes for his service in World War I; and Whereas Air Marshal Bishop continued his service to Canada in special efforts in recruiting an organization, and took a vital role in the formation of the Air Cadet League and Air Cadet Squadrons in World War II; and Whereas the National Film Board, subsidized and supported by funds supplied by the Government of Canada, has seen fit to produce a film documentary which portrays Billy Bishop as a liar, a lousy flier and an air force officer renowned for his boozing; and

Whereas the National Film Board has seen fit to give this travesty of history international circulation:

Therefore be it resolved that the Royal Canadian Legion request the Government of Canada to curtail all further provision of funds to the National Film Board until the National Film Board agrees to freeze all future usage of this abhorrent film and to withdraw it forthwith and forever from the National Film Board's library.

Honourable senators, I would like to turn now for a couple of moments to the National Film Board, the subject of our examination—and to refer to part of its mandate.

During the proceedings, the Commissioner, Mr. Macerola had this to say with repeated emphasis on the word "reality," and I quote:

As in the past, the mandate of the NFB will be to focus its programming and production on the bilingual, multicultural, multi-ethnic and regional realities of Canada.

NFB films will not only attempt to present reality . . . they will also strive to reflect on that reality.

Throughout its history, the films of the NFB have encouraged Canadians to question their destiny and their place in the world as individuals and as a nation, in North America and in the international community.

The NFB will continue to play a key role in the sustained collective effort to enrich and enliven Canadian culture.

Should we not wonder now, honourable senators, with the creation of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" as to whether it does answer any of those questions as to our destiny and our place in the nation; does it enrich and enliven Canadian culture?

Honourable senators, Mr. Cowan, the producer, makes fantastic remarks when he is interviewed. One of the ones that I have to rebut now, and this gives me the opportunity, is that he said, "The senators have heard from many military historians and veterans who agreed with the senators' view." He indicated that we had many more witnesses than they had.

Now, the reality. This is the reality: We had four witnesses: Group Captain A.J. Bauer, the Chairman of the Billy Bishop Heritage; we had Professor A.R. Kear, President of the Manitoba Branch of the RMC Club of Canada; we had Stewart K. Taylor, an historian, and we had Professor S.F. Wise, a dean of the Faculty of Graduate Studies and Research from Carleton University. I doubt whether any of these gentlemen would ever say anything that was not reality in giving evidence at the committee.

Now the National Film Board had Mr. Cowan, the director of the film; they had Mr. Macerola, the film commissioner, and they had Adam Symansky, the executive producer of the film. So we won by four to three. Isn't that terrible! And nobody ever said that we were going to call four witnesses and they were going to call three. Nobody ever said that—it just developed.

Mr. Cowan said also that they were not allowed to call witnesses. I wrote to Mr. Macerola and I also sent a letter, as a matter of courtesy, to the Acting Minister of Communications at the time. I indicated to him in the letter that they could bring witnesses, or anybody they wanted—the staff—to look on and to be present. In the conversation with Mr. Macerola he said he would like to bring around six or seven witnesses. I said, "You can bring as many as you want, but we cannot handle them all at once. I would appreciate it if we could have Mr. Cowan, or yourself, or Mr. Symansky, at first, because you are so closely related with the film." So, now Mr. Cowan says we would not let them call witnesses. This is not reality.

I might say that the National Film Board would have been wise to talk to the four witnesses that we called before us before they produced the film. They might have learned a lot more about what the facts were and about what "reality" was.

Honourable senators, I want to express another view of Billy Bishop. It is worth while to describe not only his heroism as a fighter pilot, but to put into perspective the danger that existed in his experience, which is difficult to comprehend. The best way in which I can express this experience is to refer to an editorial on Global T.V. news by Peter Trueman, who always ends up his editorial with the words, "This is reality." I put this aside. This is from November 29. It says this:

At the old Rockcliffe Air Base, now the site of our national air museum, there is a replica of a Nieuport 17 biplane . . . From the spinner on her prop to her tail skid, she is nine feet seven inches long . . . Her wing span is 26 feet on the upper wing and about half a foot less on the lower . . . She is powered by a one hundred and ten horsepower Le Rhone engine, a rotary . . . Because the entire engine spins as the tiny aircraft flies, she turns easily to the right, but fights the pilot every inch of the way if he tries to turn her left . . . Her frames are of wood and metal, and the whole fragile contraption is covered by a fabric skin and glue . . . She is armed with a single Lewis gun, calibre 303 . . . Her cruising speed is one hundred and ten kilometres an hour, that is, about 70 mph . . . and flat out she'll do one hundred and sixty five kilometres an hour at sea level . . . She is not armoured, and even in World War One, bullets travelled a lot faster.

He goes on to say:

The whole kit and caboodle, empty, weighs 825 pounds, soaking wet . . . By now you may have guessed that the Nieuport 17 in the national war museum is a replica of Billy Bishop's . . . I mean William Avery Bishop, VC, who was the top scoring Imperial ace of the First World War, credited with 72 victories . . . This flamboyant flyer was known as a crack shot, but a terrible pilot by his contemporaries . . . Now we are told in a National Film Board docu-drama called "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," that Billy Bishop was also a liar and a cheat; that he was not the hero we thought he was—

Mr. Trueman goes on to say:

Although I don't agree entirely with the senators who expressed their outrage to the producer in a recent committee meeting—

That was November 28.

I have a certain sympathy for them . . . To tell you the truth, I do not really care whether Billy Bishop shot down 72 enemy aircraft or 7 . . . Anyone who got into one of those cranky cockleshells and flew over hostile trenches, is a hero in my book . . . I cannot, as a journalist, condemn someone who has done his level best to tell the truth—whether in the final analysis the producer took us closer to the truth or farther away from it . . . But it seems to me that there are more important subjects for revisionism than Billy Bishop, whose exploits, real or imagined, made a whole generation feel better about themselves as Canadians when the flower of our young manhood was rotting in the trenches . . . May he rest in peace . . .

Honourable senators, I think that comment from the journalist puts into perspective not only the matter concerning the number of planes he shot down but the conditions he had to operate under.

● (1610)

Honourable senators, in closing my remarks, I should like to refer to an editorial in the Legion magazine. I believe this article answers some of the questions people were asking which were not mentioned in the press when they reported our committee meetings. The article states:

The NFB duo appeared before the subcommittee Nov. 28. The central issue was the accuracy of a statement the film attributed to Walter Bourne, Bishop's long-dead mechanic, that the WW I ace shot holes in his own plane to fake the raid that won him the Victoria Cross for downing three German planes.

The article then quotes from the transcript of our subcommittee. The following exchange took place between Senator Everett and Mr. Cowan:

SENATOR D. D. EVERETT: And you would agree that Bourne never made those statements?

COWAN: Yes.

EVERETT: There were statements that were put into his mouth?

COWAN: Yes.

The media missed this crucial exchange. Reporters centred on the process, making the senators look like old fuddy-duddies out to censor the NFB, which none of them set out to do. Not until the new year was Cowan's tampering with fact and chronology prominently reported by any national media.

Almost lost in the kerfuffle was the premise on which Cowan made the film: War heroes tend to make war seem less horrible than it is. "Heroes have that effect," he told the senators. "That is one of the reasons they were created. They are a simplification and, in general, a glorification of war. I think, when it comes to war heroes, we should look at them with a certain degree of skepticism."

The article then goes on to state:

Macerola conceded the film contained "some errors" and was labelled a documentary though conceived, shot and produced as a docu-drama. "We at the National Film Board were sure that the public would realize that this film was a docu-drama—even if we issued a press release saying it was a documentary . . ."

Misrepresentation of the film and the NFB's intransigence in redressing it are the nub of this whole affair.

Pioneered and used extensively by the NFB, the docu-drama is, in layman's terms, a form of film-making that is based on truth but can employ such dramatic devices as composite characters, compression of time, altered chronology and creation of unverifiable dialogue.

Macerola's descriptions were less explicit and heavy on bureaucratese:

The following are comments made by Mr. Macerola as stated in this article:

"The documentary film is the creative interpretation of reality."

"Currently—and I think this is the NFB's role at present—we're inventing new ways of describing reality. In dramas we're trying to describe new ways of defining our collective imagination."

Certainly, honourable senators, they have lots of that.

Mr. Macerola is also quoted in this article as having said:

"The docu-drama is one of the techniques which finds its place in non-fiction film-making, while pushing the frontiers of both fictional and non-fictional form."

The article goes on to state:

The upshot of the matter was Macerola's Nov. 28 announcement that "effective today" every print of The Kid Who Couldn't Miss was being withdrawn for insertion of a statement "that it is a docu-drama presenting a perspective on the nature of heroism and the legend of Billy Bishop."

All but overlooked best describes the media reaction: Canadian Press reported the withdrawal in the 13th paragraph of a 15-paragraph story in the Ottawa Citizen; in a long account on Dec. 1, CBC Sunday Morning didn't mention it; neither did CTV in its account as late as Jan. 4, 1986.

Senators also wondered when the decision was taken.

This is in connection with the decision to call it a "docu-drama," and then the article goes on to state:

A week or two earlier, Macerola said.

Just to please the committee? inquired Senator Jack Marshall.

"Absolutely not," replied the commissioner. He had made a speech a year ago describing the film as a docu-drama.

Why then did it take a whole year to make the change?

Rattled, Macerola wandered off into an incoherent reply—

Then the following exchange appears in this article:

Senator David Walker: . . . You have made a hell of a mess of it.

Macerola: With one particular film but, nevertheless, we have produced over the last (46) years close to 4,000 films at the NFB and I do not pretend that all these films are balanced, but, within our entire collection, I am quite sure that you will find a real balance between the types of films made and between the ideas carried by these films. I do not think you can question that objectivity of the NFB based on one particular film.

Reacting to Macerola's announcement about relabelling the work, film-maker Cowan interrupted the questioning to comment: "I think it is clear that to most people this is not a straight documentary. Whether we called it something else or not I think is irrelevant . . . By calling it a docu-drama, I personally am not in any way saying that what the film says is not true. I think what you are trying to do by calling it a docu-drama is that you are somehow trying to make it less true. I do not believe that. Whether we call it a docu-drama or not does not matter to me."

You can be sure it matters to veterans, many of whom have trouble enough stomaching the existence of a film that plays fast and loose with the facts and reputation of a comrade and hero.

Finally, honourable senators, I want to say this: There have always been certain individuals who have put an imprint on their society through a particular brand of courage, an act of dedication or a feat of heroism. In ancient times, those persons became immortalized in bronze and stone statutes which preserved the features of the heroes so that we can still see them today. We may not see a statute of Billy Bishop, but can we do less, as Canadians, than preserve his memory as a hero; to protect his individual rights; and do we need, for whatever reason, to produce a film which, without evidence and using public funds, would effectively destroy a Canadian veteran's proven record?

Honourable senators, I hope my colleagues in the chamber will participate in the debate in the coming days to the end that we, as the upper chamber in the Parliament of Canada, can do justice to a great Canadian.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Le Moyné, debate adjourned.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, since I have some concern about next week, I should like to place on the record a few comments in response to the remarks made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition. I have discussed this with him, and he has asked that I proceed in this matter and conclude by, perhaps, moving the adjournment in my own name. He will then have an opportunity to read my comments and, if necessary, respond next week before adoption of the report.

First, I should like to thank Senator Frith for giving me notice prior to making his comments—which I agree are valid points—on April 15. Senator Frith raised three questions, the first being: Does the joint committee need to travel to Australia to obtain information on the powers, authorities and activities of the Australian Standing Committee on Regulations and Ordinances?

[Senator Marshall.]

• (1620)

The second question he raised is: Why can this information not be obtained simply by a reading of documents? The third question raised the matter of costs and these costs being considered by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in accord with the spirit of the Seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

I should like to mention that joint committees fall outside the purview of the proposed amendments presented by Senator Molgat. In any event, certainly we all agree that we should attempt to abide by the spirit of those rules in any of the committees.

Briefly, with respect to costs, I should like to indicate that the funds required by the committee in this respect have been detailed in the joint committee's budget for the 1986-87 fiscal year. That budget, if it has not yet been presented, is about to be presented to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in the usual manner, so that senators will have the opportunity to examine what those proposed costs are. I should mention that what is presented is the budget of the entire committee, with the Senate's portion being 30 per cent, which is, as I understand it, the usual case for all joint committees.

Dealing briefly with the first two questions raised by Senator Frith, the necessity of travel and whether the same information could not be obtained otherwise, I should like to clarify the purpose of this trip. Senator Frith, in his remarks, referred to "the committee" travelling to Australia. The committee consists of 20 members of both houses, and that is not the intent. The intent is that three members of the committee would be going. In the meantime, it is proposed that the two joint chairmen, the one deputy chairman—which would mean two members of the House of Commons and one senator—as well as the two legal counsel to the committee will be travelling. I say this to indicate that the committee was mindful and conscious of the need for economy and restraint. We do have to remember, however, that, this being a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, a venture such as the proposed one will necessarily have to involve dual representation.

Senator Frith is also apparently under the impression that this delegation from the joint committee is undertaking this trip in order to obtain information on the powers, authority and activities of the Commonwealth Senate Standing Committee on Regulations and Ordinances. This is not quite the case. Our committee was invited by the chairman of the Committee of Subordinate Legislation of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Queensland to send official observers to the First Conference of Australian Subordinate Legislation Committees, to be held in Brisbane in the first week of June. It is expected that representatives of the eight Australian committees on delegated legislation will attend as delegates, while other Commonwealth jurisdictions, such as the United Kingdom, will also send official observers. The agenda of this conference will, of course, be primarily determined by reference to the problems which Australian scrutiny committees encounter in the discharge of their mandates. I fully expect, however, that the discussions held at the conference will encompass matters of interest to all committees engaged in the overview of delegated legislation.

The attendance of members of the Canadian committee at the Brisbane conference is part of a process of sustained communications and closer co-operation between the scrutiny committees of Commonwealth countries that was started at the beginning of this decade. The holding of the Second Commonwealth Conference on Delegated Legislation in Ottawa in the spring of 1983, following the First Conference held in Canberra in 1980, was a direct result of the need felt by those engaged in the often thankless task of holding the government accountable for the subordinate laws it makes and for maintaining parliamentary supremacy, to define a common approach to common difficulties. Periodical personal contacts are not only helpful to members but also give us an opportunity to meet and discuss particular problems on which we can seek the advice and counsel of our counterparts in other jurisdictions.

The benefits that accrue from these meetings are somewhat intangible; nevertheless, I suggest they are real. In Brisbane, we are to hear from the Acting Chief H. Justice of that jurisdiction. We will also have occasion to hold discussions with Professor Denis Pearce, who has a worldwide reputation in this field. As well, we will be given an opportunity to meet with the Solicitor General and the chairman of the Law Reform Commission. When all is said and done, what one gets out of such meetings and conferences is what one puts into them. Senators will know that there have recently been important developments in this country in terms of parliamentary control of delegated legislation and regulatory reform in general. We hope to use our presence in Brisbane to discuss these developments with our Commonwealth colleagues. This will assist us in gaining a perspective on the work of the joint committee and the direction it should take. The joint committee has recently decided to prepare a general report on the topic of regulation-making to Parliament, and I believe discussion with close Commonwealth colleagues who have a great deal of experience to offer can only be of benefit to us in terms of ideas and possible solutions.

Honourable senators, with those brief comments, I should like to adjourn the debate in my name for further consideration upon the return to the chamber of Senator Frith.

On motion of Senator Nurgitz, debate adjourned.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES AND BETWEEN CANADA AND WESTERN ALLIES—DELAYED ANSWER

Leave having been given to revert to Delayed Answers to Questions:

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we adjourn, I would like to give a delayed answer to my honourable friend, the Leader of the Opposition, dealing with some of the points he raised the other day regarding Libya.

The Leader of the Opposition asked a number of questions arising out of recent events in Libya, some of which I have already answered. I would like to sum up, if I may, the thrust of his questions.

My honourable friend asked for the name of the American official who came to Ottawa on Monday to speak to the government. He also asked who received this official; whether President Reagan personally advised the Prime Minister about the United States' intentions; if so, when did the President do so, and whether the Prime Minister spoke to other countries about the issue.

The Leader of the Opposition went on to ask about the nature of the consultations, whether they were "real" or merely a communication; about the nature of the evidence linking the Khadafy regime to terrorist actions, who presented it and to whom it was presented; whether the cabinet "saw" evidence from the American official that convinced us, and what that evidence was. He also asked for details about the nature of our consultations with other allies, when we consulted and so forth, and then asked when did the United States first tell Canada it would strike.

Let me try to deal with some of these questions. First, on a point of detail as to who received the United States' official last Monday, it was the Deputy Prime Minister who said in the other place on Tuesday that he received that official.

Speaking more generally, I would like to repeat what the government has been saying about recent events concerning Libya. The government's primary consideration throughout has been for the safety of the 1,300 Canadians in that country. Our actions, our consultations with the United States, with our allies and in our own councils, have been concentrated on this vital question; but our consultations have not been limited to that subject.

● (1630)

Second, I want to emphasize that our consultations with the United States, and with our other allies, have been close and continuing, as honourable senators would expect. The safety of the Canadian community in Libya has been an important consideration. Broad consultations are continuing today and will go on into the time immediately ahead.

The government has made a deliberate and conscious effort to avoid saying anything which could in any way jeopardize Canadians in Libya. The precise details of our consultations, where, when, with whom, et cetera, are obviously of a highly privileged nature. They include, among other things, sharing information pertinent to the safety of various foreign communities in Libya, and I am, for obvious reasons, not prepared to reveal these discussions. The Leader of the Opposition will know very well that it is not the practice of governments to do so.

I would also caution honourable senators from attaching particular importance to any one official—who he was and what he said. The American official's visit on Monday was simply one of a large number of contacts. I have given the general nature of our consultations, and I am not prepared to say any more.

I have already answered the questions concerning the evidence of Libyan complicity. In short, the government has already said that it received the evidence and accepted it. The nature of the evidence, how we received it and when, is also of the sort of secret intelligence which, by longstanding practice, is not discussed publicly. I simply record, however, that Chancellor Kohl of the Federal Republic of Germany, is in possession of independent evidence of his own, and is reported to have said that he regards the evidence of Libyan complicity in the Berlin disco attack as conclusive.

Questions have also been asked about what the Prime Minister meant about "the root political problems" giving rise to terrorism. There is no short answer to what is a vastly complex web of issues with political, emotional, religious and psychological bases. One of the elements, as I have said, is the Arab-Israeli dispute, but I emphasize that it is only one element.

I can report, however, that in preparation for the Tokyo Summit, which will take place in a couple of weeks time, the Secretary of State for External Affairs is framing Canada's views on this whole question, and they will be discussed as a very important political and general problem with respect to those matters that give rise to terrorism. This will be discussed with the other six countries at the Tokyo Summit. So we shall have, we hope, some progress in dealing with the general atmosphere in which terrorism breeds.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have listened carefully to the answers which the Leader of the Government has given, and while he was very precise in stating the questions, I must say that the answers were not very precise with respect to some of the questions. At least, that is my impression. I would like to read them in the record and come back to the matter at the next sitting. I did ask the question: Who was the person who came from Washington? I do not know why the Leader of the Government will not tell me. I found out myself this morning. His name is Ty Cobb.

Hon. Charles McElman: The Ty Cobb?

Senator MacEachen: He is a staff member of the National Security Council. I just wondered why the Leader of the Government would not tell me that. Is there any reason? Does he not like baseball?

Senator Roblin: That is a difficult question to answer with precision. All I can say is that the policy of the government, as expressed to me, is that that name would not be given by us, although undoubtedly it has been given by others.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government intrigues me. Why would it not be given by the Canadian government? After all, he was received by the Deputy Prime Minister. Why should we conceal his identity? I am baffled—that's all. I will come back to the subject, because I think it is really odd that an emissary is sent from Washington to Canada and we cannot be told who he is because of reasons of policy, although the emissary has gone all over Europe and it has been all over the press. I cannot understand it. Would the Leader of the Government try to find out if there is any reason why this is so? Is it because we do not want to admit that other countries were visited by a plenipotentiary and we were visited by a staff official of the National Security Council? Is that the reason? I do not know.

That is a separate question: Why, for example, did the United States delegate to the UN go to Europe and a staff official come to Ottawa? But I will not make much of that. I am concerned about the secrecy and whether there is any reason for it. I have never heard a Prime Minister, or a minister, say that you could not tell whom ministers met with from another country. We even tell if we meet with the PLO. That evidence has been put on the record.

Senator Roblin: I am not going to be able to satisfy my honourable friend this afternoon, that's clear.

Senator MacEachen: I want to thank the Leader of the Government for making this effort, and I assure him that I will examine the answers; and if they appear better in print than they do from the voice, then I will not pursue the matter. But I am afraid that I will have to come back to it, because I just cannot understand the secrecy. For example, did the President and the Prime Minister talk about this? If the answer is yes, when did they talk about it? I received no answer to that. That is a reasonable question, I think. We are in an open, democratic society. I have never heard of any difficulty about saying "Yes, the Prime Minister did speak to the President," or "He didn't."

Senator Roblin: I have already answered that one. I said that he hadn't. Look at my previous answer.

Senator MacEachen: But I have asked whether the President and the Prime Minister had spoken following the decision of the United States government to undertake the strike. That is the precise question. I know they have been speaking. I did not need to ask that. I can find that out on television. But, as I say, I will conclude by assuring the Leader of the Government that I want to come back to these questions on Tuesday after I have read the answers; and if I am not mistaken in my instantaneous impression, then I will pursue the matter.

Senator Olson: Is there a new policy of secrecy for no reason? move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, if we have finished for now, I

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 22, 1986, at 2 p.m.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA

THE LATE SENATOR ALAN MISSEN—TRIBUTE

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, news of the death on March 29 of a senator of the Commonwealth of Australia, Alan Missen, reached me on Friday. I rise to pay him tribute.

Honourable senators may well ask: What had this Australian senator to do with us? The answer, honourable senators, is that he had much to do with the successful establishment of the review of delegated legislation in this Parliament and throughout the Commonwealth. It is fitting that he be remembered here.

Senator Missen was one of a long line of forceful, independent chairmen of the Australian Senate's Regulations and Ordinances Committee, the counterpart of our Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. He was a member of the committee from 1974, and chairman in the years 1978 to 1980. The Australian Senate, armed with a statutory power of disallowance over delegated legislation, is the most effective chamber in the Commonwealth in preventing executive abuse of delegated powers. Together, the Australian Senate and its committee are Commonwealth pathfinders in the parliamentary control of executive actions under delegated authority. Senator Missen should be remembered here primarily for his personal contribution to the establishing of effective parliamentary scrutiny of delegated legislation in this Parliament, and for his bringing together of all those involved in this critical, though unsung, task throughout the Commonwealth. It was in his role as a Commonwealth elder statesman that I first met Senator Missen and thereby came to appreciate the signal contribution he had already made to Canada, quietly and generously. I learned much from him and I admired his independence of mind.

A Liberal senator from the State of Victoria, Alan Missen stood on the progressive wing of his party and never hesitated to vote against it when he considered it to be wrong.

In the late 1970s, the idea was floated that the parliamentary committees set up to scrutinize delegated legislation from around the Commonwealth should get together to share their experience, to pool their knowledge, and, just as importantly, to encourage the establishment of parliamentary scrutiny where it did not exist. Senator Missen took this idea up enthusiastically and put on the brilliantly conceived and managed First Commonwealth Conference on Delegated Legislation in Canberra in October 1980. It was an outstanding occasion.

Out of this conference grew the Commonwealth Delegated Legislation Committee, a secretariat, and the Commonwealth Delegated Legislation Bulletin. Senator Missen secured the funds to set up and maintain the secretariat and to publish the bulletin, thus ensuring that the impetus of the Canberra Conference was not lost and that its benefits were not wasted. Today, scrutiny committees in all Commonwealth jurisdictions are kept up to date with the abuses of executive power uncovered throughout the Commonwealth, and with the principles used by scrutiny committees to expose and correct those abuses. Even the failures reported in the bulletin are instructive as revealing the pitfalls to be avoided by others.

The energy flowing from the First Commonwealth Conference was channelled by Senator Missen as Chairman of the Commonwealth Delegated Legislation Committee and led to a second conference being held in this chamber in April 1983. Representatives of more jurisdictions attended and the event was a signal success. Again, Senator Missen played a leading role.

● (1400)

A further contribution of this outstanding man should be noted, honourable senators. He was very much involved in setting up the Australian Senate's Scrutiny of Bills Committee whose task is to spy out and alert the appropriate Senate committee to oppressive and unjust provisions and dangerously drawn enabling powers in bills before the Australian Senate.

The powers of this Australian Senate committee were the inspiration for my own motions to endow our own Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments with some of these powers. As senators will remember, after some years of fruitless effort, I was able to get the approval of the Senate for these in February last year, and I am hopeful that the House of Commons will soon concur.

Recently, the House of Commons adopted rule changes that will greatly increase the powers of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments with respect to disallowance of regulations. These together with my motions when they are concurred in will be Senator Missen's memorial amongst us.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

RULES OF THE SENATE

DISTRIBUTION OF REVISED EDITION

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I would like to draw your attention to the new rules of the Senate copies of which have been sent to all of you in your offices. You will have received a memo from me, the chairman of the committee, with your copy of the rules.

In your desks here in the chamber your copies of the rules have also been changed and are now up to date and no further changes will be required.

While I am on my feet, I want to point out a number of changes that are not in the rules themselves, but in the printing. You will note in the Rules of the Senate every page now bears the date, the month, and the year, so that in future it will be much easier to ensure that corrections are made and are kept up to date. Henceforth the changes will be printed and sent out as pages rather than as whole sections.

In addition, we have been able at this time to include in the volume the forms and proceedings which have not been available since the last bound volume of the Rules of the Senate. So these are now complete.

I might add that this has all been done in-house under the changes that have been set up within the Senate. The printing was all done internally at a saving of some $7,000 to $8,000 compared with past procedures. I am also informed that this new printing structure now permits us to print reports of committees in-house, and henceforth there should be a substantial saving on those, plus, of course, for any future changes in rules where there will be no additional printing cost except the cost of paper.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

LIBYA

SAFETY OF CANADIAN NATIONALS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, last Thursday I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Canadian government could relay the following message to Canadians in Libya:

You are in danger . . . You have duties to your families and we will not be able to rescue you if anything goes wrong. So don't stay there.

The Leader of the Government then stated:

But to tell me now that we should tell Canadians in Libya that they are on their own, that we will never help them,—

—which is not what I had said—

—that we cannot help them if things turn worse—which they have not done so far—seems to me to be curious advice indeed to offer.

Honourable senators, we now see that the Right Honourable Joe Clark, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, has actually told Canadians that it might be difficult to help them and that they should profit from this period of calm to get out.

I now ask the Leader of the Government whether I have him to thank for passing on the suggestion I made or whether the Secretary of State for External Affairs thought of it on his own without any help from the Leader of the Government.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not disclose comments that transpired between myself and other members of the cabinet.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

AFGHANISTAN—SOVIET ARMY DEFECTORS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, in October 1984 we were faced with the question of six deserters from the Soviet army who were prisoners of the freedom fighters in Afghanistan. Several of us raised the issue in this house. We asked that the government do whatever was possible, on humanitarian grounds, to get those defectors out. We were assured that the government would do its very best.

● (1410)

We are now faced with stories in the newspapers indicating that, instead of doing its very best, the government allowed a fight among public servants in two different government departments to turn this into an international fiasco which is endangering Canada's reputation as a country of shelter for those who need it.

Will the Leader of the Government tell me whether this situation is going to be corrected or whether we will continue to endanger Canada's reputation as a country of refuge?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I do not really share my honourable friend's view that our reputation as a hospitable place for refugees to come is endangered by what has transpired, although I cannot say that anyone is pleased about the lapse of time that has intervened. I can explain to my honourable friend that the prisoners are being held by the Afghanistan resistance inside Afghanistan and beyond the Pakistan border. Therefore, one can see that it is not practical nor, indeed, sensible for our officials to visit these people, because they cannot legally travel through Afghanistan for that purpose. At the same time, the people who are holding them in Afghanistan have refused to allow them to cross the border into Pakistan so that we can talk to them.

If there is any way in which appropriate contact can be established, the government is willing to do everything it can to ensure that they can come to this country if they want to, and that includes the varying of any regulations which may have to be put to one side in order to bring that about.

Further than that, we are trying to find some method through the use of non-governmental authorities—and I have heard the United Nations mentioned, although I cannot vouch for that at the present time—to help them. We would like to make contact with these men, and if they wish to come to this country, to make that possible.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: I thank the Leader of the Government for his generous statement. I have one more question. Today, an editorial in the New York Times urged the U.S. Senate committee to vote in favour of the free trade negotiations so as not to lose, for the United States, the vast reservoir of Canada's natural resources. Could someone inform the Americans that we are other than hewers of wood and drawers of water?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am sure that they are aware of that fact. But I am also sure that we very much value the market provided in the United States for our natural resource commodity producers, particularly of timber, ores of various kinds, fish and other products. We are anxious to see that the possibility of expanded trade between our two countries is not overlooked in the present brouhaha.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I just want to say a few words to the Leader of the Government in the

[Senator Gigant]

Senate and to ask him a question. First, respecting his best efforts and my best efforts on behalf of the potato growers of Prince Edward Island, I guess our efforts were too little, too late. We should have done this last December. If he had been able to persuade his Minister of Agriculture to act on our first request rather than on our last, I am quite sure that the people of Prince Edward Island would have appreciated it more. I also hope that the same thing does not happen in the case of the sugar-beet industry of Alberta, and by that I mean that too little will be offered too late.

Honourable senators, apparently the people of Prince Edward Island did not believe that the contract between the Government of Canada and Litton Industries was signed, and that was because I could not get the information out of the government leader. I could not get him to say "yes". Prince Edward Islanders looked all through the budget for an indication of financial assistance and they could not find any money set aside for that purpose. They must have come to the conclusion that the Minister of Supply and Services from Halifax was just talking—and this only a few days before a very important day—so they put no faith in him.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise me today whether the Government of Canada has signed that contract to have the Litton company come to Prince Edward Island?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I guess I should have taken notice of my honourable friend's wise political advice in respect of potatoes, because, obviously, although he may modestly decline any credit for the vote in Prince Edward Island, certainly I cannot take any credit for it either. There is nothing further that I can say about the substance of his question at the present time.

Senator Bonnell: Would the Leader of the Government take the next 24 hours to see if he can find a contract, signed or unsigned, with Litton; and, if it is signed, he can just say, "Yes, it is signed," and, if it is not signed, he can say, "No, it is not signed yet," so that we can tell the people in Prince Edward Island, once and for all, whether or not this was a hoax?

Senator Roblin: I would advise my honourable friend not to push me on this, because I am anxious to get it signed.

Senator Bonnell: If he is anxious to get it signed, then we understand that it is not signed yet.

TRANSPORT

CN SHOPS—MONCTON LAYOFFS

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: My third question is as follows: Today is a very important day in the history of Ottawa and Atlantic Canada, because an important group of Canadians representing the SOS Group from Moncton are in Ottawa. "SOS" means "Save Our Shops", in case honourable senators want to know. Apparently they are here because 225 people are being laid off in the city of Moncton and eight are being laid off in the province of Prince Edward Island.

The Minister of Transport assured Moncton that no drastic layoffs would be made; yet, apparently they have already lost 100 employees. Will the Leader of the Government bring the concerns of this SOS Group to the attention of the Minister of Transport, and get word back from him that no layoffs will occur in the shops in Moncton? Perhaps the Leader of the Government can get it in writing so that they can show it to him to his face in the future rather than just by word of mouth.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): The Minister of Transport's statement carries currency with me, at any rate, and I expect that his observations will prove to be the actual statement of fact. But I have no objection to asking him, in order to satisfy my honourable friend's inquiry.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I agree with the Leader of the Government. I have great respect for the Minister of Transport, because I think he is one of the better ministers in the cabinet. He is one of the most jovial, most wonderful fellows to meet, and I would almost feel like voting for him as Prime Minister—but he is not the Prime Minister. He said—and I wish to take his word for it—that there would be no massive layoffs. But in Moncton 100 people is a massive layoff. In Toronto or Montreal it might not be massive, but in Moncton it is. The situation is serious. In Charlottetown it would be terribly serious. Therefore I suspect that he must have made a mistake in his promise, or else he did not understand that in Moncton the layoff of 100 people—or 225 people in Atlantic Canada—is massive. So perhaps we should get him the dictionary and tell him that in Atlantic Canada a reduction of 225 jobs in the shops represents a massive layoff.

Senator Roblin: Well, I think my honourable friend is almost as jovial and likeable as the Minister of Transport—I would say that he is. I have to thank him for asking the question twice, and I give him the same answer as I gave him the first time.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you!

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers.

ENERGY

REDUCTION IN GASOLINE PRICES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the following reply is in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 13, 1986, by the Honourable Senator Argue, regarding energy and the reduction in gasoline prices.

(The answer follows:)

On March 12, the Minister of Energy made reference to an eleven cents per litre decrease in the price of gasoline in Victoria, B.C. during a price war. That price war has subsequently ended and prices in that centre have increased.

The Canadian major-centre average price for regular-leaded gasoline at self-serve outlets at April 18, 1986, was 43.3 cents per litre, which reflects a reduction of 9.3 cents per litre since January 3, 1986.

THE ECONOMY

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate on March 20, 1986, by Senator Murray regarding mortgages and the effect of the bank rate and interest rates.

(The answer follows:)

At present, mortgage rates are from 2.75 per cent to 3.25 per cent lower than their levels on election day. On September 4, 1984, the one-year mortgage rate at most of the major chartered banks was 13.25 per cent, while the three- and five-year mortgage rates were 14 per cent and 14.25 per cent, respectively. Today, one-year mortgage rates are 10.50 per cent, with the longer-term rates at 11.00 per cent.

The monthly payment on a typical $50,000 mortgage loan amortized over a 25-year period with a one-year term to maturity in September 1984 was $560 compared to $464 today; it was $587 on a mortgage with a three-year term to maturity compared to $481 today; and it was $596 on a mortgage with a five-year term to maturity compared to $481 today. Therefore, the reduction in mortgage rates since September 1984 translates into considerable savings for mortgage borrowers. On the one-year term mortgage the annual saving for a mortgage borrower is $1,152. For a mortgage borrower who negotiates a $50,000 mortgage loan amortized over a 25-year period with a five-year term to maturity, the annual saving is $1,380.

After remaining relatively stable during the last half of 1985, mortgage rates moved upwards in the first two months of this year but have subsequently declined. One-year mortgage rates rose by 2 percentage points through January and February, which closely paralleled the 2.2 per cent increase in the bank rate during that period. In the same period, five-year mortgage rates increased by only one half of one per cent. Since the budget, one-year mortgage rates have fallen by 1.25 per cent while five-year mortgage rates have declined by one per cent. Long-term mortgage rates are at their lowest levels since 1979.

ENERGY

OIL PRICING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, a question was raised in the Senate on March 25, 1986, by Senator Argue as to why refineries in Canada are selling gasoline for export to the U.S. at prices lower than those charged to Canadian gas stations.

(The answer follows:)

Products routinely flow in both directions across the Canada-U.S. border. Exports of Canadian gasoline to the U.S. are normal movements in the free-market environment which the Western Accord helped create.

In volatile markets, product flows generally increase as entrepreneurs seize opportunities on either side of the border.

The import of cheap gasoline from the U.S., largely by independents, is exerting additional downward pressure at the retail level, which benefits millions of Canadian consumers.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government whether he has any further answers for me on the question of Libya, particularly the questions which have not yet been dealt with? May I ask when I may expect an answer?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My statement on Thursday represented a full statement of the government's position with respect to the questions my honourable friend has asked.

Senator MacEachen: In that event, I will return to the issue tomorrow.

Senator Roblin: I will be expecting my honourable friend.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986—(Honourable Senator Le Moyne).

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, I do not intend to review the hearings held by the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, chaired by Senator Jack Marshall, concerning "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", a film of the National Film Board on Billy Bishop, the great Canadian ace of the first world war. Neither do I wish to revert to the discussions which led to the currently debated report on said film of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, chaired by Senator Arthur Tremblay. My distinguished colleagues, Senator Everett and Senator Marshall, covered the whole matter in a most thorough, convincing and moving manner. My sharing of their feelings and of their reasoning is accompanied by such a surge of adrenalin that it is extremely hard for me not to follow them all the way and embrace their conclusions. This implies more than a little sober second thought. Indeed, I had to have recourse again and again to some highly sobering and imperative reminders. It should be clear that I am not hinting at a defence of the film in question or of the National Film Board itself as collective producer of "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." The body of the report is strongly and justifiably critical, and I endorse it without any qualms. The single recommendation I make equally mine, adding in my mind as a personal footnote, that it goes as far as it can. So, I will just try to deal with a principle, a principle which is, in my view, an insuperable obstacle to the recommendations advocated by Senator Everett and Senator Marshall, but set aside by the report, and wisely so, I dare say.

[Translation]

My two colleagues have expressed what my feelings have been ever since I attended the screening of "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". The less than flattering report submitted by the committee, on which I had the honour to sit, accurately reflects my thoughts on the film. Honourable senators, I am torn. However, I will not bore you with the details of my mental anguish, and I will let you know my conclusions without further ado, and they are that we must respect and safeguard the independence of the National Film board, however disagreeable that may be to us, in the circumstances. We cannot censure the board by ordering it to withdraw or modify or remake a film we dislike so heartily. We cannot censure the board by trying to make it adhere to our standards and ideals, however constricting they may seem and no matter how outraged we may be to see those standards and ideals ignored.

Canada did something bold and original when it established a number of cultural agencies that were given mandates that were as clearcut as they could be, considering the need for tremendous flexibility in dealing with that vast and diverse area we call culture. By the way, the definition of literature given by that great French critic, Charles du Bos, could also apply to culture: "Life becoming aware of itself within the bounds of formal expression". A tall order, but that is what the State has asked these agencies to do, each in their own way.

The agencies in question: the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the Canada Council, the National Film Board and others, have been given, through their constitutions or charters, a high degree of autonomy, while remaining accountable to Parliament or to a responsible minister. They are supposed to serve the national interest, but they have a very broad field of action where they are entirely free to take the initiative and exercise their jurisdiction, each according to its mission and mandate.

There are two factors that should be considered here. First of all, these agencies cannot be treated as being other than mature. In other words, they are responsible and are expected to act accordingly. However, we also expect them to be inventive and unpredictable and even disconcerting. After all, they do have a mandate for creativity.

Second, these agencies were established some years ago, at a given time and phase in the attitudes of our society, but time goes on, and they are operating in our community as it is today. They are working within the present context, a context that is new and almost totally different from the environment that saw their birth. They are immersed in an ambience saturated with new concepts. By their very nature, our agencies are always in the extreme avant-garde.

This position in literature, the visual arts, and information, is generally not one that is familiar to political and military authorities or to the average parliamentarian. We must therefore be careful. With due respect, and without wishing to denigrate our prerogatives, we are far from being experts, especially in this day and age, which, although it has preserved many age-old and ancient values, has also managed to transform them in some way or another and create new ones, which may often shock the older generation to which we belong. We must be careful, because within our cultural agencies we have writers, playwrights, painters, filmmakers and journalists, the peers of their avant-garde counterparts in the private sector, who manage to scandalize a lot of old fogies. In fact, the guilty parties in these situations are very often interchangeable!

We must be careful, because in view of the role they have to play, our agencies cannot help but hire people who work autonomously and freely in the disciplines they have chosen. Freedom is capable of respect, but its inclination to irreverence does not necessarily mean it should be censured. We cannot seriously expect the public servants and freelance workers in our agencies to behave like good little girls and boys. We cannot order them to avoid offending the susceptibilities of old age, capital, the masses, religion, finance, the army, or unions. In fact, we expect them to demonstrate their vitality by challenging the status quo. One does not need the tools of a burglar or the instruments of a surgeon: all one needs is a fresh perspective.

[English]

So, honourable senators, in establishing its cultural agencies the government was taking quite a risk, the very risk inherent to the freedom of those institutions. Of course, a line had to be drawn between what was to be held as acceptable and what had to be deemed inadmissible. But, as I have already hinted, it could never be a neat and fixed line. Reality always fluctuates and is partly Everyman's representation at any moment of history. Again, let us beware, for the line never stands very long in relation to given co-ordinates.

Allow me a fantasy in analogy: The Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology is travelling in France a hundred and twenty years ago. Incensed by a canvas of a bursar of the Canada Council of Arts named Paul Cézanne, its members manage to bar him from the Salon officiel. In 1896, the same committee tries to stop the play Ubu roi, by the surrealist Alfred Jarry because of its outrageous vulgarity. Then it will wait until 1960 to lift the ban on Lady Chatterley's Lover, a dirty novel written in kinky ink by one D.H. Lawrence, meanwhile fulminating against Picasso, Schoenberg, Webern and Mondrian. The committee would not feel very good, considering the subsequent and quick judgments of history on these enemies of decency.

I do not mean by this little flight of fancy that our cultural agencies are bursting with geniuses whom we are too dumb to discern. No. What I mean is that one should not be too quick to condemn and censure. On sober second examination, our imaginary committee could have discovered much more than met at first the sincere eye or the most sensitive ear—much more, that is a lot of masterpieces. In the domain of ordinary artistic, literary and cinematographic fare, the real committee very wisely contented itself with criticism without censure. And, during the Péquiste episode, the government held its peace in the case of Radio-Canada despite almost unbearable itchings. Indeed, the idea of a sort of lockout was in the air. Patience, according to the British gospel, happily prevailed, and so did Canada.

● (1430)

"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" was not made by a solid old geezer, but by a high-strung young man whose philosophy of war is rather short, whose perception of heroes and their function in the stuff of society is negative, and whose debunking propensities are, so to speak, unchecked. It happens, honourable senators, that the mentality thus expressed is prevalent among the young generations with many, many other outlooks and trends of the most deplorable kind, according to more than a few orthodoxies. Mr. Cowan is part of that context of modernity which can often be so unsettling, and so is the National Film Board. Such debunking as that so rashly attempted in "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" is peanuts compared to what one can witness in any serious contemporary work of exegesis. Nevertheless, debunking, which is a form or a result of criticism, is one of the main characteristics of the age and one of its most valuable contributions to the evolution of humanity. I rejoice in criticism because of the resulting advancement of science, because of the deepening of psychological awareness, and above all because of the ongoing purification of theological faith, so long encumbered by layer upon layer of anthropomorphism.

However painful justified or unjustified debunking might be, it cannot be limited or stopped by order of Parliament or of the judiciary, or by established censure. In instances similar and analogous to the one deferred to us, censorship is just like slashing air. I would rather tilt at windmills like Don Quixote: It's a lot more fun! But unjustified and self-serving debunking might be corrected and compensated by real criticism, of which the report of our Social Affairs Committee on the Bishop film is a worthy example. I find it devastating and, inasmuch as it does not go beyond the single recommendation, I rejoice in it. But one could ask with understandable irritation: When is the state allowed to impose its will on its cultural agencies? In money matters, of course, but those are barely relevant here. Aside from high treason, manifest criminal activities, and violation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I see nothing to warrant intervention.

Honourable senators, whether we like it or not, there is a hole in Bishop's story as an air force ace. In the admirable succession of the established details of his service over there, one encounters a solution of continuity. None of the witnesses we heard could deny it: the famous solo raid which gained him the Victoria Cross cannot be substantiated, historically proved, scientifically established. Great was my dismay when finally I had to admit the damned and damning hole could not be plugged with any concrete fact, with any fact hard as concrete. All tangible evidence has disappeared with different archives.

I was not dismayed because of any doubt concerning the integrity of Bishop the fighter giving account of himself, for I hold the presumptions in his favour to be overwhelming. They are enough for me and for many others to preserve intact, unblemished, the memory of Bishop as the greatest Canadian ace, as a real hero for his time, for our time and forever. But such presumptions are not enough to constitute an airtight case. Without that unfortunate hole in Bishop's life, the NFB would never have produced "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". But it was there, gaping, unavoidable, undeniable, and it was maliciously, in our opinion, made to act like a geyser spouting fore and aft in time, doubt and suspicion. Our favourable use of presumptions founded on Bishop's career and character is subjectively correct, but it is not compelling from an historical point of view, and the possibility of doubt remains. Of doubt, though, and nothing more. Allow me to insist: the possibility remains, but of a doubt such that in all honesty it should never have been allowed any reverberation.

The case of Mr. Cowan cannot be better than that of Bishop's friends and admirers, and it is far from as good. It is a bad case, for it lies against the grain of a long pattern of limpid valour and heroism.

All things said and considered, what the recommendation of our committee asks is for us the maximum and for the NFB the minimum: designate properly as docu-drama what cannot be held to be a documentary, confess fiction and hop along your own way. Real formal censorship must not be attempted in the present case and in the present circumstances—it would violate a principle dear to the Canadian sense of freedom and democracy, notwithstanding the risks entailed; it would put in jeopardy our very maturity as an enlightened society; it would create a precedent upon which all reactionary forces would pounce and feast, and it would expose the Senate to a damning identification with those same elements of reaction.

Let us suppose, honourable senators, that we decided for censorship. We would gain nothing. We would be laughed at because there is more at stake than Bishop's fame, that is, the whole cultural dynamism of our time, because the government would certainly not dare to intervene in fear of the wrath of the whole literary college, of the whole artistic community, even of the whole cité savante, and because the NFB would never give a damn.

Our strong criticism was all that could be done honourably, and we acted honourably. The rest belongs to freedom. I feel sure that "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" will be forgotten long, long before the memory of Billy Bishop starts to fade.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

[Senator Moyne.]

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to express my complete accord and admiration for the statements just made by Senator Le Moyne.

[Translation]

I think he has expressed the spirit of civilization and maturity which is the hallmark of this country. A few years ago England awarded grants for the production of a film entitled "Oh! What a Lovely War" which heaped ridicule on General Hay, the World War I commander in chief of English troops. He was represented as someone who was totally unaware, irresponsible, therefore a kind of murderer. England did not attempt to ban the film.

The remarks of Senator Le Moyne attests to a tradition of tolerance, understanding, and maturity, as does, in my opinion, the decision of this very distinguished chamber's Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology which refused to censure an artistic production and thus upheld freedom of expression, something which matters a lot more to us than any kind of creator's prank.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Would Senator Gigantès accept a question? Was the English film he mentioned—"Oh! What a Lovely War"—presented as a historical film or a film of fiction?

Senator Gigantès: It was fiction. I concur with the decision of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology which deplored the fact that the Billy Bishop film was presented as a documentary yet contained elements of fiction. This aspect was highlighted in the report, and I agree.

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I wonder if I could ask Senator Gigantès: Was that British film produced by a government organization or in the private sector? Who was the producer?

Senator Gigantès: There are subsidies given by the British government to the British film industry much as we give subsidies to our film industry. It was not a government organization. But the fact that the National Film Board is a government organization makes it even more imperative that we show towards such government organizations a greater reluctance to intervene and that we keep the arm's-length relationship that is the glory and the pride of Canada. I am not saying that a Senate committee or a House of Commons committee, when estimates for such an organization come before it, should not say, "Are you spending your money properly?" But I am saying that the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, as prepared by Senator Marshall's subcommittee, went almost to the limit but did not cross that limit and kept that arm's-length relationship. To do more would result in the dire consequences that Senator Le Moyne talked about.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Murray).

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I regret that because of a meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, I was not able to be present in the chamber when Senator Fairbairn delivered the final installment of her speech last Wednesday afternoon. I have, however, read her speech very carefully and I was present to hear her deliver the first several chapters.

I congratulate her on an excellent speech. I do so without hesitation at the same time as I say that I do not support—as it now stands—the motion that she presented at the conclusion of the speech. That motion would have us adopt the report of the committee.

There are recommendations in the committee's report that I find appealing; there are other proposals that I find less so. But even in respect of those recommendations that I believe have some merit, I would like to be much more confident than I am that they represent an improvement over the federal programs now in place.

Therein lies one criticism that I would make of the work of the committee and of its report. The committee does not attempt to analyze or to do a critique of the programs directed to youth that are now in place in the federal government. What I have in mind is the kind of critique that was done of our regional economic development programs a few years ago by the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

A second criticism is that some of the recommendations of the committee were put forward with little or no supporting arguments or documentation. The recommendations that I would criticize on this count are, perhaps, not central to the main thrust of the report, but the fact that they have been presented with not much supporting argument or documentation gives me some difficulty.

Third, there is no indication in the report of the cost of its proposals. I do not believe that the Senate can be asked credibly to endorse a report containing 26 proposals when we have no idea, or very little idea, of their cost individually or collectively.

Well, what is the subject matter of this report? Who are we talking about? Youth. People aged 15 to 24; 17.2 per cent of the population; 4.3 million Canadians. But the focus of the report is not on the majority of youth. The focus of the report is not on those whom Senator Fairbairn has described as "the success stories,—those 80 per cent, God bless them, who had some kind of job, or who were thriving at school and university with the assistance of strong support systems of family and friends." The focus is on a minority of youth. It is, in particular, on the deplorably large minority of unemployed youth.

There has been reference in the debate to various behavioural problems and to their incidence among the younger generation. I think it should be pointed out that the report, and the statistics adduced by the report, show that these behavioural problems are not of the epidemic proportions that are sometimes imagined by older people. Indeed, if I read the report and the statistics correctly, the abuse of alcohol and drugs, for example, has tapered off somewhat in recent years. Smoking is less prevalent among the younger generation—except for teen-aged girls—than it is among their elders.

As for the statistics on crime rates and suicide, I find the statistics cited by the report inconclusive in differentiating, in any important way, the younger generation from their elders, or in relating the incidences of crime and suicide to the economic and social conditions in the country. The one fact that does leap off the page is the tragic fact that suicide, crime rates, and all these terrible problems, are far more prevalent among the native youth than they are among the non-native younger population.

The royal commission headed by the Honourable Donald Macdonald described youth unemployment as "a current problem which is expected gradually to disappear". The Macdonald commission was, of course, basing that conclusion on demographic projections. It is forecast that the 15 to 24-year old group will decline from 17 per cent of the population—which is what it is now—to some 14 per cent in 1990, and to 12 or 13 per cent in the year 2000. So, we are looking at a smaller youth component entering the labour force and less competition for jobs at the entry level.

Here I must take issue with the Senate committee's alarming, and, I think, alarmist projections concerning the unemployment rate in general, and youth unemployment in particular, for the rest of this century. The committee bases its projections on a study done by Professor John B. Robinson, Director of the Waterloo Simulation Research Facility. At page 86 of the report, the committee draws on Professor Robinson's research to conclude:

—even under the most optimistic assumptions, . . . rates of unemployment will increase to 20% and more through the year 2010.

Neither Professor Robinson nor the committee makes projections about the youth unemployment rate, but, at page 84, the committee report states:

—the 15 to 24 year olds in each year between now and 2010 will also suffer high rates of unemployment.

• (1450)

I must say that Professor Robinson's predictions, which the Senate committee has made its own, are in sharp contrast to the general consensus in the forecasting business. For example, if you take the average of the four long-term projections done for the Macdonald commission on the unemployment rate, it forecasts an unemployment rate of 9.7 per cent in 1990 and of 7.5 per cent in the year 2000—a far cry from the steady increases that are forecast by Professor Robinson and by the Senate committee.

Youth unemployment is shown to decline by other forecasters. The Conference Board, for example, predicts that by 1990 youth unemployment will be down to 13.6 per cent, still very high. Some work done for the Institute for Policy Analysis at the University of Toronto and cited in the Macdonald royal commission report predicts that by 1990 youth unemployment will be below the unemployment rate for adults. It would be, according to this analysis, at 4.8 per cent in 1990.

The fact that the consensus of forecasters disagrees with Professor Robinson does not, of course, mean that he or the Senate committee is wrong, but I think I should point out that at page 87 of the committee report there appears one of Dr. Robinson's statistical graphs which projected unemployment in 1985 at approximately 17 per cent. We know that the reality was that in 1985 unemployment decreased to 10.5 per cent. Reality also is that youth unemployment, which was at 19.9 per cent in 1983, declined to 16.5 per cent in 1985 and to 15.9 per cent at the present time—still high; still too high. But the direction is downward; the direction is for a decline in the youth unemployment rate.

I cite these differences of opinion not to quarrel with the committee or, indeed, with Professor Robinson, but because there are implications for policy in all this. What the Macdonald commission concludes from these projections, which show a declining unemployment rate in general and a declining youth unemployment rate, is that employment policy should focus more on the current generation of youth rather than on the smaller numbers of young people expected to enter the labour force in the future. The Macdonald commission poses the troubling question, which is echoed by the committee report, as to whether the current generation of youth will become the unemployed adults of the future. Will they be so permanently scarred by this experience of unemployment in their youth that there is a high probability that they will be unemployed as adults? The royal commission says that the research on this point is inconclusive and limited, largely, to the United States experience. However, it does make the following point at page 600:

Improved general employment prospects are clearly necessary, and the improvement, when it materializes, may be sufficient to reduce unemployment within this cohort. Still, continued monitoring of its labour-market situation will be needed. It would be unfortunate to have in place a range of special programs for youth at a time when the groups facing the greatest labour-market difficulties were the 25- to 34 or the 35-to 44-year-olds.

The Senate committee, quoting one of its witnesses, takes a more pessimistic and, indeed, more categorical position on this when they say, simply, at page 85:

—many of the young people out of work today will be unable to find a job during their lifetime.

Who are today's unemployed youth? Historically, a distinction has been made between the 15- to 19-year-olds on the one hand and the 20- to 24-year-olds on the other. The Senate committee report in several places observes this distinction, pointing out that among natives and non-natives, among males and females, the unemployment rates have been substantially higher among 15- to 19-year-olds than among 20- to 24-year-olds. The Senate report explains that the reason for this is that most 15- to 19-year-olds looking for a job are high school graduates or drop-outs, while those in the upper age groups are more likely to have some level of post-secondary education.

This important link between education and employment recurs throughout the committee report, as it does in all the studies I have seen on this subject. The report points out that in December 1985 young people—and here I am talking of the whole group, that is, the 15- to 24-year-olds—with only an elementary education had an unemployment rate of 27.6 per cent; those with a high school education had an unemployment rate of 17.7 per cent; and those with a post-secondary diploma or certificate or a university degree had an unemployment rate of 9.8 per cent, much closer to the national average. This kind of statistic was quoted for different time frames by the Macdonald royal commission and, before that, by the Economic Council of Canada's 1982 study entitled, In Short Supply: Jobs and Skills in the 1980s.

The committee report concludes that, despite the criticisms of the education system, there is a relationship between completing school and being more likely to find a job.

It is understandable, then, that the Senate committee has devoted a good deal of its attention to education and training matters. They endorse the report of Mr. A.W. Johnson on the federal financing of post-secondary education which is a subject for another debate.

Federal involvement in training programs has never lacked criticism, and the committee underlines some of the criticisms made in the past. However, I think it should be noted that, over the years, the federal effort in the training field has been considerable. I saw some statistics comparing the percentage of gross domestic product devoted to training programs in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and West Germany, and none of the other countries came close to Canada over the time period being studied. I will not take the Senate through the Technical and Vocational Training Act of 1960; the Adult Occupational Training Act of 1966; or even the National Training Act of 1982 with their various objectives, some of them mutually inconsistent.

The committee has looked at the problem from the perspective of young unemployed Canadians. They conclude that government skills training programs, which build benefit entitlements for a short period, are only frustrating to young people wanting permanent work and a sense of purpose. At page 65 of the report, it is stated:

In areas of high and long-term unemployment, we met young Canadians who had been through a variety of training programs. They had skills but no jobs and none were likely to be available. Training, therefore, was no longer training but simply a way of gaining some money and putting in time while waiting for full-time work.

In this respect, the Senate committee echoed the findings of the 1982 report of the Economic Council of Canada, as well as a number of reports that have been done on this problem, including that of the parliamentary task force appointed in 1980 under the chairmanship of the Honourable Warren Allmand. The 1985 OECD report entitled "New Policies for the Young" says that the key to policy options for improving job-related skill training is likely to be the extent to which it is consistent with market forces.

● (1500)

I think it is important to point out that the Macdonald royal commission expresses the view that federal policy, especially since the introduction of the National Training Act in 1982, is on the right track. Among other examples, the commission cites the movement towards on-the-job training and away from institutional programs. The commission mentions the general industrial training program, under which Employment and Immigration Canada contracts with employers to reimburse a share of the cost of employee training programs. It also mentions the critical trades skill training program, which is designed to provide training in designated occupations where there is a shortage of skills which are of national importance.

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the job entry program, which, although based on an experimental program carried out under the previous government, is a new program. It offers a combination of up to 52 weeks of skilled training and practical work experience. It is a program for young people who have not graduated from a post-secondary institution, with priority for those who have not finished secondary school. There are now 10,000 young people taking part in 320 projects under this program.

The report of the Senate committee endorsed co-op education, the concept under which students get formally integrated periods of academic studies and work experience in the private sector. The federal government is offering financial contributions to approved co-op education programs in schools, high schools and universities over a four-year time frame. I am informed that last year there were 65 applications approved, involving 40,000 students, over four years. The government is continuing to modify its training programs in line with the admonition of many studies, to the effect that these training programs must be made more relevant to the needs of the economy.

Honourable senators will be aware of the arrangement for institutional training under which the federal government purchases seats in community colleges for particular courses for clients from the Employment Canada centres. The number of seats and the courses to be chosen are negotiated every year between the Department of Employment and Immigration and the province or territory concerned. The government is trying to reduce the amount of money made available in this way and to use the money saved to fund employers to buy these seats at the training courses. The assumption here is that the employer in the community has a better idea of the manpower requirements in the local market than the two senior levels of government would have. This arrangement would also impose some responsibility on the community college to sell its services to the local businesses. This new wrinkle has been written into the agreements signed for 1986-87, under the National Training Act, with the provinces of Ontario and Newfoundland.

To come back to the Macdonald commission, bearing in mind these programs, its report states:

Broadly speaking, then, the directions set out in the National Training Act, the agreements signed pursuant to that act and the increased emphasis given to on-the-job training seem quite appropriate, and commissioners do not recommend any change of course.

The Senate committee also draws attention to the relative lack of apprenticeship programs in Canada and to the lack of uniformity in apprenticeship and training across the country. The Economic Council's 1982 study, to which I referred earlier, found that, of all the industrial countries, Canada had one of the smallest proportions of total civilian employment engaged in apprenticeship training. The ECC noted at the time the lack of uniformity in standards and accreditation. I may say that the parliamentary task force in 1980 also emphasized the importance of increasing apprenticeship training. I add that the need for an effective apprenticeship training program in this country seems to me to be underlined by the statistics I quoted earlier showing youth unemployment at its worst amongst those who have had the least schooling. The Macdonald commission quoted the chairperson of the Toronto Board of Education as saying that our record in this country is appalling in providing the transition from school to work for those who leave school early or immediately following the acquisition of a secondary school diploma.

The Senate committee recommends an apprenticeship program along the lines of the West German, Austrian or Swedish models. This type of program, as carried out in Europe, is obligatory for those not in regular schools or post-secondary institutions. The Macdonald commission looked at this model and was of the view that, in a fiscally unconstrained world, it would recommend a generalized program along the German lines, but it was rejected as being too expensive for Canada at this time. The Macdonald commission suggested, instead, the reinstatement of the 1978 tax credit program which was targeted at youth, and, in order to pay for this tax expenditure, it recommended the elimination of all specifically youth-targeted direct job creation.

The tax credit, as it was recommended, would work in such a way that, for example, the government might subsidize the wages of a 15-year old by, let us say, $1.50 per hour, the wages of a 16- or 17-year old by, let us say, $1.00 an hour, and so on. The point is that the program would, in the view of the royal commission, ensure some on-the-job training for today's uneducated and untrained unemployed young people.

There are drawbacks to the tax credit scheme, some of which are acknowledged by the commission. One not mentioned is the possibility that the availability of increased employment opportunities for youngsters of 15 or 16 years of age will encourage them to leave school early, which surely is exactly what we do not want. Indeed, the committee is at some pains to point out that it is in the interests of youngsters to stay in school longer if they are to enter the job market with any confidence of obtaining employment. I may say parenthetically that I hope that provincial governments and the federal government might give more consideration to the kinds of policies that should be put in place to encourage young people to stay in school and to stay at home rather than to hit the road and enter the job market prematurely.

Honourable senators, I think the recommendation of the Senate committee should be considered, as should the alternative recommendation of the Macdonald commission for reinstatement of the 1978 tax credit program. It should be borne in mind that none of the on-the-job training programs or apprenticeship programs seems to work very well when the economy is generally slack. In this connection, the Macdonald commission notes with approval the efforts of the government to support laid-off apprentices so that they can continue their training even after they have been laid off from their employment. It should also be borne in mind that there is considerable criticism in a number of reports that have been made on this subject of employers in this country. The statement is made not once but several times in several different reports that employers in this country under-invest in human resources.

In any case, a study conducted for the Macdonald commission by Leon Muszynski indicates that since the beginning of the recession of 1981-82 there has been a large surplus in the federal account in respect of on-the-job training programs. He says:

• (1510)

Employers are unable or unwilling to take up these federal training resources because of the lack of economic demand.

Muszynski was writing, presumably, in mid-1984. I am told that the situation has improved considerably in recent months as the economy has improved and that there is now a pretty big demand from employers for these programs. But the point that was made is, I think, valid enough, and also the inference that efforts must be made to continue these on-the-job training programs even when, in periods of economic slack, there would be a tendency to lay off some of the people who are being trained.

Honourable senators, I must say that I believe that this country has shown a great deal of concern about the serious problem of youth unemployment. Governments at both the federal and provincial level have not been complacent, callous or uninformed, and they have devoted considerable resources and effort to combatting youth unemployment. They have acknowledged the shortcomings of some of the programs and have tried, and are trying, to improve them. Government agencies and commissions, and non-governmental bodies, have conducted studies and analyses with a view to designing more effective policies and programs.

The unique contribution of the Senate committee was not in breaking new ground, or in offering new and original solutions to the problem. The contribution of the Senate committee, it seems to me, was, first, that it went to the young people themselves, including the unemployed young people, and attempted to see the problem and the programs from their perspective. Obviously this experience had a profound effect on the members of the committee and they have eloquently conveyed this fact in their speeches in the course of this debate.

Second, the Senate committee has again placed the problem, in its serious economic and social implication, and in its serious current dimension, on the parliamentary agenda. The report is a good basis for pursuing this problem. The various recommendations of this committee, and other studies that have been made—I have mentioned a few of them—need to be analyzed, compared and discussed. Some programs now in place are of quite recent origin. I am thinking of those that have been put in place pursuant to the National Training Act. These programs need to be monitored. The commitment of the department and of the government has to be sustained. There must be no attempt to use the progress that is being made in reducing youth unemployment as a reason for reducing the overall effort to attack the problem.

Progress is being made. Over the past 18 or 20 months, youth unemployment is down by 79,000. Youth employment is up by 46,000. The unemployment rate has dropped from 18.4 per cent to 15.9 per cent. In studying the problem, and in discussing new policies, programs and solutions, we must not lose sight of the effort that is being devoted to the problem and of the progress that is being made.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to adjourn this debate in my name until Thursday.

POINT OF ORDER

Senator Flynn: Before the honourable senator does so, I should like to raise a point of order.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I was surprised to hear Senator Murray say that Senator Fairbairn had proposed the adoption of the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth. I would suggest that this motion of Senator Fairbairn is quite irregular and contrary to our rules.

We are studying the report pursuant to an inquiry, which is so defined in Senate rule 5(f):

“inquiry” means the procedure whereby a senator, after giving notice in accordance with Rules 43 and 44, calls the attention of the Senate to a particular matter for the purpose of informing the Senate of that matter or having it considered or examined by the Senate;

So far there have been a few speeches on this matter. We are considering a report, as we usually do. Indeed, it is extremely rare that this kind of report from a committee that has studied a question is submitted to the Senate for approval.

In concluding her remarks—I was absent and could not object at the time, and nobody noticed, as I will indicate later—Senator Fairbairn said:

Meanwhile we in this chamber can take one step forward by formally endorsing the conclusions of the youth committee. Therefore, I move, seconded by Senator Frith, the adoption by this house of “A Plan of Action”, the report of the Special Senate Committee on Youth.

Senator Fairbairn added a few words, and the debate was adjourned on the motion of Senator Doody. Therefore, the proposition of Senator Fairbairn was not submitted to the Senate. My first objection is that the Senate is not technically seized of this proposition.

My second objection is that it is quite irregular to transform an inquiry into a substantive motion. I have just defined the word “inquiry”. Under a substantive motion, the Senate is asked to express its opinion on a given subject. Such is the case here.

Now then, this kind of substantive motion proposing the adoption of a special committee report, requires two days’ notice, as specified under Senate rule 44.(1)(e):

44.(1) Two days’ notice shall be given of any of the following motions:

(e) for the adoption of the report of a special committee;

So far the Senate had been asked to consider the report. However, it is quite irregular suddenly to transform this proposition to consider a report into a motion for adoption; this would require a separate motion, with two days’ notice.

For all those reasons I would suggest that Senator Fairbairn’s motion cannot be considered and must be rejected. The debate can continue on the inquiry as such. Should Senator Fairbairn want to propose the adoption of some of the report conclusions, or of the report as a whole, she may do so, but separately, not pursuant to this inquiry. In fact it amounts to changing an inquiry into a substantive motion, and we would be contravening the provisions of rule 44 if we were to proceed without notice.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to make one or two preliminary comments on the point of order. I think that the transgression, if there is a transgression, against the rules should have been raised at the moment when Senator Fairbairn proposed her motion, which was seconded by Senator Frith. It is not possible to go back several days in order to correct what may have been a breach of the rules. I would suggest that when Senator Fairbairn moved her motion—which was seconded by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—the Senate itself concurred in the transformation of this inquiry into a substantive motion.

That obviously is what happened. Senator Fairbairn was permitted to give her speech, the debate was adjourned by Senator Murray, and the debate was resumed today—all the while, the Senate having concurred in what happened when the motion was made. Careful consideration must be given to the suggestion that at this moment, the proceedings having continued as they have, we ought to retrace our steps and attempt to reverse an implicit, if not explicit, decision made by the Senate itself. It is a standard rule of procedure that when a breach of order takes place, it must be drawn to the attention of either the Chair or, in this case, the Senate. It is not good enough to do it several days later. I find great difficulty in accepting this point of order.

Senator Flynn: I am not putting it to you.

Senator MacEachen: I am giving my impression. I think that if Senator Flynn had observed matters when Senator Fairbairn put her motion, which she did quite clearly, which was seconded by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and which was sanctified by the next intervener, who was the Deputy Leader of the Government, we would not be in this predicament. We have gone on now for some days, and Senator Flynn has suddenly discovered that something has gone wrong and that he must correct it. I think it is quite improper.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If the matter is taken under advisement by the Speaker, and I suggest it will be, he also ought to look at the fact that our records, if my appreciation of them is correct, do not record a separate motion being put on this matter in the way that it appears on our order paper. I may be wrong in that, and I stand to be corrected, but my impression is that that is another factor that should be taken into account.

Senator MacEachen: A very important one.

Hon. Philippe D. Gigantès: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I would like the assurance that this point of order and its resolution will not deprive me of the opportunity to answer Senator Murray. If I have this assurance, then I ask honourable senators to excuse my lack of familiarity with the hallowed rules of this splendid chamber.

Senator Flynn: There is no problem there. If the motion is declared to be irregular, the debate on the inquiry will continue and Senator Gigantès will be able to speak. If Senator Fairbairn wishes to move her motion for adoption, Senator Gigantès will again be able to speak.

In reply to the Leader of the Opposition, first, I want to say that he is certainly abusing the intelligence of the Senate when he speaks of several days having passed. After all, we adjourned last Thursday and this is the first time since then that the Senate has met.

Senator MacEachen: When did that occur?

Senator Flynn: Thursday, and we have not met since then.

Senator MacEachen: When did Senator Fairbairn make her speech?

Senator Flynn: Last Thursday.

Senator Corbin: No, Wednesday.

Senator Flynn: That is right. Anyway, when the Leader of the Opposition speaks of several days, it is not true because there is only one intervening day.

Senator MacEachen: I think that Wednesday, Thursday and now Tuesday amount to several days.

Senator Flynn: The second point is that the Speaker should have put the motion and in doing so should have asked if leave was granted. That was not done, and that is why I say it was done without the knowledge of the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: We were all here.

Senator Hicks: It was done with concurrence.

Senator Flynn: Something that has not been put correctly cannot be ratified. For instance, suppose the Speaker forgot to warn the Senate that when the sponsor of a motion or of a bill speaks the second time, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate. The correct course would be that anybody could speak following the sponsor's speech. Senator MacEachen knows that fact very well.

Furthermore, the question of raising a matter immediately is true in the case where somebody has said something about someone else. It is a question of privilege.

Senator MacEachen: There is a question of order also.

Senator Flynn: If it is a question of order or regulation, of course it can be raised, as has happened on several occasions.

Senator MacEachen: The last time that was done was by Speaker Beaudoin.

Senator Flynn: You may have forgotten. Anyway, I leave the matter to the Senate.

Senator MacEachen: You are trying to turn the clock back.

Senator Flynn: You cannot change an inquiry into a substantive motion like this one.

The Hon. the Speaker: Rule 78(3) states:

A report which by its own terms is for the information only of the Senate shall be laid on the Table but may on motion be placed on the Orders of the Day for future consideration.

The question is: Was this motion proposed or moved? According to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, at page 1238, leave was not asked for nor granted. The Minutes say in part:

The Honourable Senator Fairbairn moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, that the Report be adopted.

After debate,

The Honourable Senator Doody for the Honourable Senator Murray moved, seconded by the Honourable Senator Phillips, that further debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: I object to the fact that the Minutes do not conform to Hansard. A change has been made, probably by the staff, and it does not apply. It cannot be accepted. The motion was not put.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, may I take the matter under advisement and rule on it tomorrow?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, I take it that next Thursday I may answer Senator Murray's points. Is that agreed, and am I allowed to adjourn this debate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Roblin: It seems to me, and I would like to get the opinion of the Senate on this, that the matter as to what we are actually debating has been taken under advisement by the Speaker. At least, that is the point that has been made, whether it is consideration of the report or adoption of the report—two quite different matters. As the Speaker has taken the matter under advisement for ruling, I think the proper course is to leave the order on the order paper as it is at present and if my honourable friend wishes to speak after the ruling, whatever it happens to be, I, for one, would be quite prepared to hear him.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

CORRECTIONS

DANIEL HAWE REPORT—MOTION NO. 3 ADOPTED—DEBATE ON MOTIONS NOS. 4, 5 and 6 ADJOURNED

Hon. Earl A. Hastings, pursuant to notice of March 26, 1986, moved:

That there be laid before this House copy of the service contract between Correction Service of Canada and Daniel Hawe or Daniel Hawe and Associates Ltd. of Edmonton with respect to the Daniel Hawe Report on Community Correction Services in Alberta;

That there be laid before this House detailed statement of expenditures by the Correction Service of Canada with respect to the Daniel Hawe Report on Community Correction Services in Alberta;

That there be laid before this House copy of service contract between Task Force on Program Review and Daniel Hawe or Daniel Hawe and Associates Ltd. of Edmonton with respect to Study Team on Corrections;

That there be laid before this House copy of any service contracts that may now be in effect between Daniel Hawe or Daniel Hawe and Associates Ltd. of Edmonton, Alberta, and the Correction Service of Canada.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis:

That there be laid before this House copy of the service contract between Correction Service of Canada and Daniel Hawe or Daniel Hawe and Associates Ltd. of Edmonton with respect to the Daniel Hawe Report on Community Correction Services in Alberta.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Hastings, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis:

That there be laid before this House detailed statement of expenditures by the Correction Service of Canada with respect to the Daniel Hawe Report on Community Correction Service in Alberta.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am really asking for some clarification. I have never seen one of these things in action before. Perhaps Senator Hastings could tell us what we are doing. Is this an order for return, or what exactly is it?

Senator Hastings: I have never had anything to do with this kind of thing before either, but as I understand it, it is a motion for return and it must proceed in this way. In other words, it is an order for return.

Senator Doody: If Senator Hastings moves it, and we all agree, what happens then? I always like to anticipate the next move.

Senator Hastings: According to rule 110 of Rules of the Senate of Canada:

Accounts and papers may be ordered to be laid on the Table, and the Clerk of the Senate shall communicate to the Leader of the Government in the Senate all orders for papers made by the Senate and such papers when returned shall be laid on the Table.

That is rule 110.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think there may be a slight problem here as far as I am concerned. I am not familiar with this procedure, I must admit. When a senator wants an order for return, I do not think he usually moves a motion in the Senate asking for it. He simply tables his order for return.

If we are going to do it by way of motion, I think I will need to look at the substance of the matter to see whether there is anything in the motion which I should normally warn the Senate would cause difficulty in terms of providing an answer.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): The motion has already been put.

Senator Hastings: Yes, the motion has already been put.

Senator Doody: There are four of them here.

Senator Roblin: In that event, I will adjourn the debate until I look at it.

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I think that motion No. 3 carried. Therefore, you are adjourning motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6.

Senator Roblin: I hope the Senate will allow me to take a look at these questions in depth because I would not like to be a party to accepting an order for return which might cause some difficulties in terms of the constitutional propriety of answering the questions. If the Senate insists on adopting it now, they may do so. I cannot prevent that, but I have to make that observation because it may be the case. If there is no problem with the order, then we need not concern ourselves, but I think it is sufficient if I make that reservation now.

Senator MacEachen: What is the reservation?

Senator Roblin: I want to examine the terms of the question to see whether there are any facts asked for there that are not customarily returnable. That is all. If the matter is straightforward, then there will be no problem, but I thought I should just enter this caveat in case there is some problem. I have not examined the orders myself.

Senator Hastings: On a point of order, honourable senators, there is no procedure in the Senate for an order for return. I was instructed that this is the way to proceed; in other words, to have a paper tabled in this house. The government has now had almost 30 days to respond to the motion and they have not yet responded. It was then drawn to my attention that the Leader of the Government must be instructed to table the documents, under rule 110.

Senator Roblin: As honourable senators will know, I do not deal with these matters until they are moved in the Senate. A lot of time goes by between the notice and actual action. I will look into it. I hope there is no problem, but I simply issue that caveat.

Senator MacEachen: I point out that one particular motion moved by Senator Hastings has already been adopted and we are not reversing that. The next motion has been deferred until Senator Roblin has had an opportunity to determine whether there is any objection.

There can be occasions when the government can say that it is not prepared to table a document, for example, if it represented a confidential exchange with a provincial government or something of that kind, but we will agree to wait and see what Senator Roblin has to offer before we proceed further.

The Hon. the Speaker: I take it, then, that the Honourable Leader of the Government is adjourning the debate on motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6 on the order paper?

Senator Roblin: I think that I would be less than candid if I did not say I am also going to ask about motion No. 3 to make sure that there is no problem. I may be just starting at hares here. There may be nothing wrong with the orders at all, but I think I should reserve the matter for consideration.

Senator Hastings: On that point, I think that the government or the Leader of the Government can refuse to table any document. In other words, the Leader of the Government can come back and tell me that he does not intend to table those documents, and that is fine. However, I must ask for it first in this way. The procedure is to ask for the document, and then the Leader of the Government can tell me that he does not want to show me the document.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am a little confused. I would like to ask a question. Why is the honourable senator proceeding this way rather than under the Freedom of Information Act? Why are we taking up the time of the Senate in this way?

Senator MacEachen: You must pay a fee under the Freedom of Information Act!

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate on motions Nos. 4, 5 and 6 adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

YOUTH

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ON MOTION
FOR ADOPTION—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: I take it that this applause is to encourage my absence rather than to welcome my return!

Honourable senators, yesterday, while I was rejoicing with fellow Liberals at Queen's Park over the beginning of another session under the administration of that government, a point of order was raised by Senator Flynn. Could I have leave to put on the record one or two comments with regard to that point of order? I realize that His Honour might well be ruling on it today, but I want to be sure that this material is before him.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: That has to be done at the time the point of order is raised. I do not see how it can be put on the record now.

Senator Frith: I have read the proceedings, and I follow the point that Senator Phillips is making.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I seconded the motion for concurrence in the report which is the subject of Order No. 5, so I appreciate the opportunity senators have extended to me to explain why I thought it was in order to do so. I understood that Senator Fairbairn intended to move the adoption of or concurrence in the report. I mentioned to Senator Doody that I would be seconding that motion and that I did have some precedents for that procedure. I should now like to put on the record the precedents I had in mind at that time, which are two in number and quite short.

The first appears in Beauchesne at chapter 15, page 204, citation 651:

(1) Any Member may move concurrence in a committee report whether or not he is a member of the committee.

The second precedent is taken from Debates of the Senate of April 19, 1978, when there was before the Senate the fourth report of a standing joint committee. This is what appears in the debates of that date at page 691:

The Senate resumed from yesterday the debate on the consideration of the fourth report of the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

HON. JACQUES FLYNN: Honourable senators, when I adjourned the debate yesterday, I did so in order to verify the exact situation with regard to this report. I found that it was placed on the order paper for consideration.

The same situation applies in the case now before us.

Senator Lafond spoke, and then adjourned the debate on behalf of Senator Forsey, and Senator Forsey spoke yesterday. At the conclusion of his remarks he was asked by the Speaker whether he was moving adoption of the report. The motion, in fact, was only for consideration. Senator Forsey said he had no objection, and, in fact, he would love to have the report adopted.

I would prefer that we go a little further, and that the Senate concur in the conclusions of the report, which is critical of the government's actions and the method chosen to increase the postal tariff. On the other hand, it may be a matter of semantics whether we adopt the report or concur in its conclusions.

I am informed that the House of Commons unanimously adopted this report, which, of course, is from a joint committee. I do not know whether I require leave to do so, but if there is no objection I would move that the report be now adopted.

SENATOR GROSART: I second the motion.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

That was the basis upon which I told Senator Doody that I felt there was good precedent for moving the adoption of the report, even though it was before the Senate for consideration at the time.

As to the matter of notice, I suggest that we are faced with the same situation as that which applied in the precedent to which I referred, although yesterday Senator Flynn, as I read the proceedings, quite correctly pointed out that, in the case before us under Order No. 5, the report issues from a special committee, and in that respect differs from my precedent. However, that really would only raise the question of notice, and the proceedings demonstrate that we gave leave. Honourable senators, I thank you for the opportunity to put that before the Senate and before His Honour in connection with his ruling.

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ON MOTION FOR ADOPTION—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable Senators, yesterday the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., raised a point of order respecting the motion moved by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn for the adoption of the Report of the Special Joint Committee on Youth. Senator Flynn suggested that the motion was irregular and contrary to the rules of the Senate.

Judging from the ensuing debate, it seemed normal to me that one cannot change, at will, the nature of a procedure by substituting a motion for adoption for a simple tabling proposal.

However, in view of the fact that the Senate is master of its own procedure and free to dispense with the strict implementation of the rules, whether explicitly or implicitly, I must inform the Senate that I cannot rule on the point of order as raised because that point of order should, in fact, have been raised immediately following Senator Fairbairn's motion.

In this respect, I refer you to citation 237 of the 5th Edition of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, which reads as follows:

"A point of order against procedure must be raised promptly and before the question has passed to a stage at which the objection would be out of place."

I should comment, however, on Senator Flynn's statement that the Minutes do not conform to Hansard. He stated that, and I quote:

I object to the fact that the Minutes do not conform to Hansard. A change has been made, probably by the staff, and it does not apply. It cannot be accepted. The motion was not put.

I have examined the Clerk's Scroll for April 16, 1986, which indicates that the question on Senator Fairbairn's motion was indeed put by the Chair, as is recorded on page 1238 of the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. One must admit that Hansard is not as comprehensive as the Journals, which constitute the official record of the Senate.

Thereafter, the debate on the motion was adjourned by Senator Doody on behalf of Senator Murray.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, April 29, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

If leave is granted, I should like to make a comment.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, last week, when we moved the adjournment motion, we indicated the possibility that Bill C-62, the Employment Equity Bill, and Bill C-87, the Canadian Arsenals Bill, would reach us this week. To date that has not happened. We feel that those bills will reach us early next week.

Therefore, rather than keep honourable senators here tomorrow, we have decided that it might be more appropriate to adjourn until Tuesday next. I should like to emphasize, however, that the schedule of committees is not affected. The committees that were scheduled to meet tomorrow and through the week will meet as arranged, and the adjournment of the Senate until next Tuesday should not interfere in any way with the ongoing work of the committees.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA—UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, with respect to today's deliberations in the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States, which is apparently meeting to approve the fast-track negotiations with Canada on free trade, Prime Minister Mulroney has said during this recent pause that there would be a "clear launch" for these negotiations. The Right Honourable Joe Clark, Secretary of State for External Affairs, has said that there would be no pre-conditions to these negotiations.

Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise the Senate as to what has happened to the Prime Minister's undertakings to Parliament and to the people of Canada that cultural industries, the auto pact, marketing boards and lumber would not be on the table? Has the Government of Canada decided to obtain an agreement at any cost and in the process renege on promises and policies to exclude these issues from the negotiations?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I can say that the Government of Canada has not changed its policies. We are interested in having a clean launch. That is the undertaking that has been exchanged between the President and the Prime Minister. There are, of course, certain matters, and this applies to both parties, which may be on the bargaining table at some time and to which they intend to make no changes. I think that the ones mentioned by my honourable friend are probably among that number.

GARRISON DAM PROJECT—UNITED STATES STUDY OF BILL

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, also in the United States today, the matter of the Garrison Dam project has come up. In fact, a committee there is presently studying amendments to a bill on the Garrison project. Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether or not we have any observers there, and has he any information that he could give to us on what is taking place? I know that at the present time the Senate in Washington, D.C. is studying Bill 111, which refers to the Garrison project. The particular amendment involved in that bill does not affect Canada, and particularly Manitoba, directly, but I think we ought to keep a close eye on any developments with regard to the Garrison project. Would the Leader of the Government bring us up to date on the matter, and if he does not have any information at the moment, would he bring in a report on this particular subject as soon as possible?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I agree with my honourable friend that the question of the Garrison project is very important to the people of Manitoba and that we should keep it under consideration.

The information that I have is that the latest arrangements that have been made for the Garrison project are to protect the interests of the province which my colleague and I come from. Senator Guay has brought to my notice further developments in this affair with which, frankly, I am not familiar. I shall endeavour to get some information about the matter to see whether there is anything that ought to concern us.

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND UNITED STATES AND BETWEEN CANADA AND WESTERN ALLIES

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to go back to the questions which I raised with the Leader of the Government with respect to Libya and which the Leader of the Government replied to in the form of a statement at the end of our proceedings on Thursday last. I said at that time that if I found the content of his statement satisfactory I would drop the matter, but that has not been my experience. Therefore, I want to go back to a number of questions upon which I would like to have some clarification.

One of the questions I asked the Leader of the Government was whether a conversation or conversations had taken place between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister on the Libyan air strike. The most recent statement of my interest was conveyed on Thursday last, at page 2324 of Hansard. At that time, I said:

For example, did the President and the Prime Minister talk about this? If the answer is yes, when did they talk about it? I received no answer to that. That is a reasonable question, I think.

Then I went on to say:

We are in an open, democratic society. I have never heard of any difficulty about saying 'Yes, the Prime Minister did speak to the President,' or 'He didn't.'

Senator Roblin then replied:

I have already answered that one. I said that he hadn't. Look at my previous answer.

• (1410)

I did make a diligent search of previous answers, and I find that on Tuesday, April 15, I asked the following question at page 2262:

Were there any discussions held between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada, or between the Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada and the Secretary of State for the United States on this matter—

And the matter, of course, was the air strike.

—or did the consultation take the form of a visit of an official of the American government to Ottawa? If that is the case, and the consultation was undertaken on the American side by an official, with whom did he consult while in Ottawa?

Senator Roblin then said:

I can tell my friend that this matter has been the subject of conversations between the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of Canada.

I then went on to say:

I am interested in that. Is it true, then, that the President advised the Prime Minister personally that he had authorized or that he proposed to carry out this action against Libya?

Senator Roblin then said:

I have no information as to what took place in those discussions.

I then said:

May I ask when those discussions took place between the President and the Prime Minister?

Senator Roblin replied:

I shall try to find out the answer to that question.

I am now left with the statement made on Thursday, April 17, that the President and Prime Minister had not spoken, and with a clear statement on the preceding Tuesday that conversations on this matter—namely, the Libyan air strike—had taken place. At that time, I asked when, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate promised to get that information, so I really think that requires some clarification.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is perfectly true that my friend asked me a series of leading questions with respect to the whole of this matter of the exchanges of information between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, and in the case of those that I did not answer at the time I undertook to obtain some kind of statement on subsequently. I did that, and I made that statement in the house on Thursday. I regret to tell my honourable friend that there is nothing I can add to that statement.

Senator MacEachen: I think that the Leader of the Government in the Senate must be obliged to remove the contradiction, at least, between the statement which he made on Thursday, namely, that the President and the Prime Minister had not spoken, and the one that he made on Tuesday that they had spoken on the Libyan air strike. Which is the true version?

Senator Roblin: I dare say that I may have said too much when I was speaking to my honourable friend. If I had been cognizant of the full position, as I am now, I would not, perhaps, have answered any of his questions. However, I really cannot add anything to what I have said. If the two statements do not agree, I must say that I am not in a position to explain or to go into the matter any further at the present time.

Questions of a similar nature were asked of the Prime Minister in the other place last week, and he declined to answer them on the grounds that the safety and security of Canadians was at stake. It is obvious that I cannot go beyond him.

Senator MacEachen: I think we are in an extraordinary situation. On Tuesday, the Leader of the Government said that the President and the Prime Minister had conversations on the Libyan air strike; then on Thursday, he said that they had not. Those are statements which the Leader of the Government made, and I think we are entitled to find out which is the correct one.

● (1415)

Senator Roblin: I will undertake to review my statements to see whether they are exactly as my friend says. However, I do not have a copy of them in front of me now.

Senator MacEachen: I can assure the leader that I read them and that they do contradict each other. The Leader of the Government in the Senate said on Tuesday that there were conversations between the President and the Prime Minister respecting the Libyan air strike. The leader said he would obtain information as to when that conversation took place. I expect that answer. I think it is extraordinary that the Leader of the Government has contradicted himself and now refuses to help us decide which is the true version.

Senator Roblin: If I thought that clarifying that question would satisfy my honourable friend, I might be inclined to do so, but I know perfectly well that as soon as we get into that aspect the Leader of the Opposition will present further questions, questions which I am not at liberty to deal with.

Senator MacEachen: Why the clam up? Why, in the name of common sense does information on whether the President and the Prime Minister spoke affect the safety of Canadians in Libya? That is the reason the Leader of the Government has adduced for not answering. Can he explain that?

It is known that Margaret Thatcher and the President spoke, that Mitterrand and the President spoke, so why can't we know whether the Prime Minister and the President of the United States spoke? Why is there this particular situation respecting Canada?

[Senator Roblin.]

I must say that the Leader of the Government is not going to get away with this. If he refuses to co-operate with the Senate of Canada, I can tell him that—

Senator Flynn: What can you do about it?

Senator MacEachen: —there are ways we can refuse to co-operate with the Leader of the Government.

Senator Flynn: Oh, oh.

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is threatening me, as I think he is, he ought to know that threats will get him nowhere with me.

Senator MacEachen: Then let me appeal to his reasoning. Will the leader clarify whether or not the President of the United States and the Prime Minister spoke with respect to the Libyan air strike? That is no threat; that is a request to clarify statements made by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Roblin: Yes, I will clarify that statement, and I will do so at my first opportunity, but I can make no further statements in respect of the matter.

Senator MacEachen: Does the Leader of the Opposition know whether these conversations took place or not?

Senator Flynn: The Leader of the Opposition knows nothing!

Senator MacEachen: We have just learned how much Senator Flynn knows about the Senate. Despite his long presence in the Senate, he knows nothing about the rules, and he demonstrates that every day by his disorderly conduct. He did that yesterday, and he is doing that again today.

I do not, however, intend to be diverted by Senator Flynn, who is coming to the rescue of the Leader of the Government, who is in—

Senator Flynn: Of the Senate!

Senator MacEachen: —a dreadful position because he told the Senate on Tuesday that the President and the Prime Minister spoke about the Libyan air strike, and then he told the Senate on Thursday they did not. Today he is mute; he cannot answer; he has to find out on which day he was telling the truth to the Senate; whether it was on Tuesday or Thursday.

Senator Roblin: I resent the implications of that statement. My honourable friend knows why I want to examine the matter, and that is because I want to see exactly what I said. I do not accept his interpretation of what I said. If the Leader of the Opposition is right, and if there is a contradiction in what I have said, I will clarify it. I have said that and I will do that.

To accuse me of trying to deceive the Senate, which I think he is trying to do, is not correct. I do my best to give answers, but I have to admit that I sometimes misspeak myself, and maybe I did on that occasion. I think I am entitled to look at Hansard to see exactly what my words were, and if there is a contradiction I will clarify it.

Senator MacEachen: I think that is fair enough.

May I have the opportunity to ask permission of the Senate to revert to Question Period after the Senate has dealt with the business before it today? I ask that so that, in the meantime, the Leader of the Government will have an opportunity to consult Hansard.

Senator Roblin: I think I will take my time consulting Hansard.

Senator Frith: No doubt! There is no surprise there.

● (1420)

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I can understand the embarrassment of members on the other side of the house.

Senator Flynn: We are bored, not embarrassed.

Senator Walker: We are tired of you.

Senator MacEachen: I have never seen a situation that is so embarrassing—

Senator Balfour: Yes, you have.

Senator MacEachen: —for the Leader of the Government and for his followers. On a matter of this importance, and after having advised the Senate twice in reply to direct questions and after a lapse of four days, the Leader of the Government is not in a position today to tell us whether the Prime Minister and the President actually spoke on these serious matters.

I leave it to the good sense of the Leader of the Government to extricate himself from this embarrassing and untenable position, which I am sure he finds quite difficult. I wonder why he permits himself to be put—

Senator Flynn: Balderdash!

Senator MacEachen: —in this position.

May I ask the Leader of the Government another question which arises out of his statement on Thursday and which seems to contradict an earlier statement which he made in the house? It has to do with the evidence of Libyan complicity. The Leader of the Government said:

I have already answered the questions concerning the evidence of Libyan complicity. In short, the government has already said that it received the evidence and accepted it. The nature of the evidence, how we received it and when, is also of the sort of secret intelligence which, by longstanding practice, is not discussed publicly.

I am referring more particularly to the comment “how we received it and when.”

On Wednesday, in reply to a question which I asked, the Leader of the Government said that Mr. Nielsen had been given the evidence by Ty Cobb, that he had examined the evidence and that he found it convincing and credible.

Now, by his statement on Thursday, is he withdrawing his assertion on Wednesday that Mr. Nielsen had examined the evidence which was presented to him by the special envoy from the United States?

Senator Roblin: I don't think I made any statement as to whom Mr. Nielsen spoke to. I think my friend has put those words in my mouth. They are not correct. I don't think I said that. In my statement on Thursday—if I can find the correct clause here—I think I said that the Deputy Leader of the Government in the other place had stated that he was the one who had been dealing with the Americans in respect of this matter.

Senator MacEachen: Well, it is true that the Leader of the Government, for reasons which are not clear and have not been explained, has refused to identify the person who came from Washington to Ottawa, for reasons of policy. He has not identified him, but we know who the person is. I do not think that that is the substance of my question.

In an answer to me—

Senator Walker: I am sure.

Senator MacEachen: —on Wednesday, or earlier in the week, the Leader of the Government said that the Deputy Prime Minister had received the special envoy, that he had received the evidence, had examined it and found it convincing. I want to know whether that answer still stands.

Senator Roblin: Not only does it stand, but I repeated the information in my statement on Thursday.

Senator MacEachen: On Thursday the Leader of the Government stated that:

The nature of the evidence, how we received it and when—is not discussed publicly.

There is a contradiction, and I want to know whether the statements made on Wednesday with respect to the evidence can be taken to be true, namely, that Mr. Nielsen did receive the evidence, did examine it and did find it credible.

● (1425)

Senator Roblin: If the honourable senator will read my statement of Thursday, he will see that I made specific reference to the fact that it was the Deputy Prime Minister who received the official. Therefore, the rest of my answers follow from that.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government, in this paragraph, is talking about the evidence of Libyan complicity, and that is the question which I addressed to him. He told me on Thursday that by longstanding practice it is not possible to say how and when we received it. On Wednesday, he told me it was received and examined by the Deputy Prime Minister. I want to know whether Wednesday's answer still stands.

Senator Balfour: Is this Question Period or cross-examination?

Senator Roblin: The statement I made on Thursday was that the Deputy Prime Minister was the one who received the official. That is as far as I intend to go in the matter. I believe the rest of my statements on the previous occasion are accurate.

Senator MacEachen: Is the Leader of the Government saying that the Deputy Prime Minister did receive the evidence, did examine it and did find it convincing?

Senator Roblin: I have already given the answer to that question in the affirmative; my friend knows it.

Senator MacEachen: In other words, the Leader of the Government has withdrawn that portion of his statement of Thursday last which says that the government, as a matter of policy, refuses to say when and where it obtained the evidence.

Senator Roblin: What I am saying is that that is my position. If I gave my honourable friend information that goes beyond that on another occasion, that does not mean to say that it is inaccurate. If my honourable friend wants to hold me to his Jesuitical line of questioning, he is welcome to do so, but he must remember that I have the option of refusing to reply if I do not wish to do so.

Senator MacEachen: Is that the attitude the Leader of the Government is now taking—that he will refuse to answer further questions?

Senator Roblin: I will answer any questions which deserve to be answered.

Senator Frith: And those that you do not answer, Senator Flynn or Senator Walker will answer. It is a question to the three of you, because we get answers from all three.

Senator Flynn: You are grumbling.

Senator Frith: Number one lapdog!

The Hon. the Speaker: Order! Senator MacEachen has the floor.

Senator Flynn: He has had the floor for about half an hour and he has been abusing the rules regarding Question Period.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Flynn: This is totally irregular. If he wants to launch a debate, he should do so.

Senator Guay: Sit down!

Senator Flynn: The only thing Senator Guay can do properly is make noise.

Senator Guay: You sure make a lot of that yourself. You can't even hear yourself.

Senator Flynn: I protest because the Leader of the Opposition is going about Question Period in a totally irregular way.

Senator Frith: In every case he has asked a question.

Senator Flynn: Even if Senator Frith is not in agreement—and I know he is—he would rather make a little noise himself although his cannot compare with that made by Senator Guay.

Senator Guay: No one can compare with you.

Senator Flynn: If we are allowed to proceed in this way, so be it; that is up to the Senate, but it will not improve our image.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me significant that the point of order was raised by Senator Flynn, not by Senator Roblin. Senator Roblin was trying to answer the questions; they were questions, and he was dealing with them as such. Of course, we now find that when questions are addressed we have to expect some answers from the two on his left. The questions were asked of Senator Roblin, and he was trying to answer them. Now it is raised by Senator Flynn, I take it, on behalf of Senator Roblin, that there is something irregular in asking questions—

[Senator MacEachen.]

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Frith:—arising out of answers given on a previous occasion. I will tell senators why I am sure that Senator Roblin did not raise the objection. It is because when he sat on this side he did that very thing, and we never called him to order on it because it was turned into a valuable exchange. Sure, many of these exchanges can be described as debates, but they arise out of questions asked or answers given. Often, when we gave delayed answers, Senator Roblin would stand and pursue those answers by asking for further information or clarification. That is why he has not objected—he realizes that when he sat on this side the same procedure took place and was as much in order then as it is now.

• (1430)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think I have to add something to what Senator Frith has been saying. It is true that I did ask questions when I sat over there, but there was a significant difference.

Senator Frith: You were asking them; that is all.

Senator Roblin: I was asking questions of ministers who had portfolios.

Senator Frith: That was not at all always the case.

Senator Roblin: Most of the time I asked questions of ministers who had portfolios and who should have been expected to know the details of their departments. That is not the case now, and I make no apologies for this.

My honourable friend the Leader of the Opposition is a very skilled parliamentarian. He leads me, with some—how shall I say this?—satisfaction into areas in which he certainly is an expert, namely, international affairs. I, innocently—I suppose that is the correct word—try to give him an answer. Then, when we come to further consideration of the matter, he has a lot of fun in pointing out what he thinks to be contradictions in what I have said.

I am not saying that I do not make contradictions, but I must say that I have to take counsel on the answers to questions. All my friend is accomplishing by that is placing me in the position of taking questions as notice. I do not answer because they do not come within my particular knowledge.

If we want a free and honest discussion of these issues—which I try to do in this house—then that fact has to be taken into account. I am quite within my rights in responding to questions by taking them as notice because they do not come within any portfolio or responsibility of mine, no matter how urgent the issue may be thought to be by members of the other side. I think that a little give and take is required here.

Senator Frith: Sure; agreed.

Senator Roblin: I am trying to do my part, but if I am going to be cross-examined in this way—perhaps quite legitimately—it will certainly mean that, in future, I am going to be far more careful in my answers than I have been heretofore.

Senator Frith: Fine.

Senator Roblin: I will certainly take questions as notice rather than attempt to answer them when I do not have the direct information.

Senator Frith: No one is objecting to that.

Hon. David Walker: Your Honour, in answer to your remarks on a debate, rule 32 states:

A debate shall not be in order on an oral question, but brief explanatory remarks may be made by the senator making the interrogation and by the senator answering the same. Observations upon any such answer shall not be allowed.

Thank you, Your Honour, for making the interjection.

Senator Frith ought to have this framed and put in his bathroom.

Senator Frith: It is framed, and we are right within its bounds.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I wish to make a statement on the point of order. It is to the effect that I certainly agree with give and take. I have never found it unparliamentary, in my experience, to engage in questions, and repeated questions. I thought that was part of the parliamentary process. If I am mistaken, I must say that I am learning my mistake at a very advanced stage of my parliamentary career.

But I will put that aside and say to the Leader of the Government that I believe I have been very reasonable with respect to these questions, which were put a week ago yesterday for the first time. I am still awaiting answers. On Thursday, when the Leader of the Government rose and sought permission to revert to Delayed Answers to make a statement, I listened and told him that I would examine the statement. I said that on my first impression I thought it had failed to answer my questions. Yesterday, I did not ask any questions because I found that when examining the statement given on Thursday and previous answers there were, in my view, contradictions. I thought the Leader of the Government might have risen yesterday to clarify those.

I am not pressing and I have not pressed for an immediate answer. I still want the answers, and a week of notice has been given. If another week is necessary, then I think that is excessive, and that is the conclusion of my point of order.

I think that it is not a matter of statistics in this case. It is a matter that can affect the peace of the world. It is under debate everywhere in the world and it should be, in my view, a top priority of the government and the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: Surely one or two weeks is enough time to get answers. If I must now give notice, I want to give notice of further questions on Libya. I will sit down, should others want to ask questions, and return to the matter later.

Senator Flynn: Announce an inquiry, if you want to.

Senator Roblin: I think my friend deserves a comment. If he thinks there are any inconsistencies in what I have said, I am perfectly willing to examine those. He has given me one, at any rate. I did not re-read what I had said in the Senate because I was not aware of any inconsistencies. If there are, I will do my best to explain what I believe the correct answer to be. But that is about as far as I can go. If my honourable friend wants to repeat his series of questions about the negotiations that took place between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States, I am not able to give him any more information.

It is perfectly clear that when there are negotiations between states those are generally regarded as confidential matters. It is also perfectly clear that if they involve the safety and welfare of Canadians that is another good reason why there should not be the sort of examination that he certainly wants. So I have to tell him that I will be glad to try to deal with any inconsistencies that he thinks I have committed—if so, they have certainly been unwitting ones—but if he expects me to go beyond the general statement that I made on Thursday last, I do not think I will be able to oblige him. I simply will not answer those questions.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, on Wednesday last I asked the Leader of the Government this question:

Following the information given to Canada by the United States of its intention to engage in this strike, were there consultations, after that event, with our European allies to determine what their views were?

The Leader of the Government replied:

I think that is the case, but I am going to check to be doubly sure—

Honourable senators, I think it is reasonable to expect an answer to that question, which was first asked on April 16. Today it is April 23. Can he give me an answer today?

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I discussed the nature of his question with the officials, with my cabinet colleagues and with those who are outlining government policy in this matter, and the advice that I received from them was that that was one of the categories of questions they were not prepared to answer.

Senator MacEachen: Was it a decision made by the Government of Canada not to tell us whether the Canadian government consulted with other governments? Is that a decision of the government or is it a decision of some official of the Privy Council?

Senator Roblin: No, it is a decision of the government. It was announced in general terms by the Prime Minister in the other place last week. The reason for it is quite clear. At the present time, we have been able to protect very well indeed the interests of Canadians in Libya, and we want to maintain and reinforce that state of affairs. We do not wish to be drawn into discussions to satisfy those questions of my honourable friend that might have a tendency to change that happy situation.

Senator MacEachen: The Leader of the Government is becoming even more incomprehensible. He talks about a "happy situation" in Libya for Canadians, and this at a time when the Secretary of State for External Affairs has encouraged and, indeed, has asked all Canadians to leave Libya. Does he know what is going on?

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend would, of course, pounce on that—that is just the kind of debating technique he delights in. What I am telling him is that the Libyan government has been very co-operative with us in dealing with those of our people who want to leave Libya. It has been co-operative in terms of making it possible for them to leave that country. The airport is open and we want to ensure that that happy situation—to the extent that our people are facilitated in their departure, should they wish to go—does not change and that Canadians who stay in the country are treated in a decent manner.

● (1440)

Senator MacEachen: What the Leader of the Government is saying is that the Canadian government cannot tell the Parliament of Canada whether it spoke to the United States or to its European allies, in case that knowledge will offend Colonel Khadafy. I find that quite unacceptable—

Senator Frith: Hear, hear.

Senator MacEachen:—quite unacceptable.

Senator Roblin: Well, of course, that is the kind of position that my honourable friend would never have approached within a million miles of taking when he was the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Was there ever a Secretary of State for External Affairs who was more adept at avoiding questions within the House of Commons with respect to his portfolio? He established a reputation nationwide as being the hardest man in Parliament to pin down on anything.

Senator Frith: You are gaining on him fast.

Senator Roblin: I admit that I am taking lessons. I am taking lessons from a man who would not answer questions and who knows how to try to ask questions. He has both sides of the field covered.

Senator MacEachen: A metamorphosis.

Senator Roblin: Well, the metamorphosis has not fooled me. He may no longer be the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but I remember very well how he reacted; and if anyone were to say to him in those days that he should divulge information which had the potential—let us say it is no more than that—of harming Canadians in any part of this world, particularly in a very tricky situation such as we have now, he would be the last man to answer questions which he felt trespassed on that situation. I believe that is the situation today. I don't care a hoot whether he agrees with me or not, but I tell him that it is the policy of this government to protect the safety and security of Canadians—and I will not be goaded into answering questions to satisfy his curiosity with respect to the policy of the Canadian government the answers to which would do these very things and harm our people. The Leader of the Opposition smiles; he laughs.

[Senator Roblin.]

Senator MacEachen: Ridiculous. You are ridiculous.

Senator Roblin: He makes me smile, because I remember how he comported himself when he was answering questions in the House of Commons. He was pretty good. If I get to be as smart as he was in answering questions, I think that I will have registered a pretty high degree.

Senator Doody: Hear, hear.

Senator Frith: I think I can say, "Hear, hear".

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, it has been my experience in dealing with the Leader of the Government that at any point in any exchange in a debate, when the going gets rough, he begins to attack my past, either as Minister of Finance, as Leader of the Government or as Secretary of State for External Affairs. That is a good indication that the Leader of the Government is in deep trouble. I want to tell him that I have never heard, in over 30 years in Parliament, a minister say, "I refuse to tell whether there were discussions"—not what was in the discussions—"between the Prime Minister and the head of another government." Nor have I ever heard a minister refuse to answer a question as to whether there were discussions between the Canadian government and the governments of Europe—never heard it. Why, in the name of God, should we conceal that we talked to the President of the United States, or the heads of government or ministers in Europe? On the face of it, it is absurd. But then, to add insult to injury by saying, "Well, we will not do it because we are afraid that Colonel Khadafy will be upset and hurt Canadians in Libya—"

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator MacEachen: That is what he is saying, and it is absurd.

Senator Flynn: That's false.

Senator Roblin: I usually have a very high respect for my honourable friend's interventions in this house, because he has long experience and he knows every trick of the trade. There is not a single thing about parliamentary conduct that he does not know about. In fact, some people thought that he wrote the book. Then he says to me he is surprised that I will not answer a question because it will make Colonel Khadafy mad. Well, now, I want to tell him that that is the most jejune statement, coming from such an experienced statesman, that I have ever heard. The Leader of the Opposition knows perfectly well that it is not a question of what Colonel Khadafy thinks. The fundamental question is how do we protect the safety of Canadians. That is the issue.

Senator MacEachen: Against whom?

Senator Frith: Against Khadafy. That's all he is saying.

Senator Flynn: He did not say that.

Senator Frith: Yes, he did.

Senator Roblin: All you have to do is ask the question. You know the answer.

Senator MacEachen: He talked about the government of Libya—and who is the government of Libya?

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

HUMAN RIGHTS

FATE OF POLISH REFUGEE

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, a couple of weeks ago a Polish refugee, seeking political asylum in Switzerland, and also applying for a Canadian visa, was hurriedly deported to an unhappy fate in Poland. Can the Leader of the Government tell us today, or at a later date, whether this case was damaged by any bureaucratic bungling, or rigidity, or hardhearted regulations? If not, could he inform us whether the Canadian government has launched any formal protest to the Swiss government on its treatment of this case?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, until my honourable friend gives me some idea of what the case is, there is just no way that I can answer it. If he is willing to give me information as to who was concerned, the time and the place, then I think that is a matter that can be investigated.

ABSENCE OF SENATORS FROM MEMBERSHIP OF OBSERVER GROUP AT BERNE MEETING

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question relating to human contacts, human rights and refugee matters. Last week a human contacts meeting under the CSCE process was begun, and to my knowledge there is a Canadian parliamentary observation group at that meeting in Berne, Switzerland. Can the Leader of the Government tell us why no senators were asked to serve on that Canadian parliamentary observation group?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have no idea.

Senator Haidasz: Will you find out for us, please?

Senator Roblin: No.

Senator Haidasz: Why not? We are entitled to answers.

Senator Roblin: I would like to point out to my honourable friend that questions may be asked, but I am not obliged to give answers. I do not know why no senators were appointed to that committee. There may well have been a good reason. However, if my honourable friend feels strongly about it, I will try to find out for him as best I can.

2. Strike out subclause 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void".—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Frith can give us any information on this order, which stands in the name of Senator Neiman. I understand that because Senator Neiman will not be with us for some time some arrangement has been made.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have spoken to Senator Neiman and also to Senator Nurgitz. I believe that the consensus is that we proceed with the bill and send it to the other place after adopting Senator Flynn's amendment. I understand that Senator Nurgitz will be absent for the rest of this week. I shall talk to Senator Nurgitz next week and determine whether we can dispose of the matter next week.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Senator Nurgitz told me that he had no objections.

Senator Frith: I agree. However, I wanted to confirm with him whether he and Senator Neiman have the same feelings about it. I believe she has no objections either.

Senator Flynn: That's what we have heard, about ten times now.

Senator Frith: I have nothing more to add.

Senator Roblin: Come on, add something.

Senator Frith: Apparently Senator Flynn has something to add.

Senator Flynn: We will leave it there.

Senator Frith: I have nothing to add. I said that I would talk to Senator Nurgitz and Senator Neiman to be sure on the matter. I do know that there were some reservations about the amendment, but I believe that they have been cleared up now. I merely want to assure myself on that point.

What a tetchy lot!

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Perrault.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Raymond J. Perrault: Honourable senators, I would like to say at the outset that together with many members of this chamber and Canadians from coast to coast, I have developed a great deal of admiration for a number of the productions of the National Film Board. In many ways it has been one of the most progressive, advanced and enterprising units in the entire world. For example, productions by Norman McLaren have brought this nation the highest awards for animation on film, as have many other productions of the very highest quality and world standard. I have not come here this afternoon to pillory the National Film Board. May I suggest, however, that they should be congratulated when they produce excellent productions, but they should not be immune from criticism when they produce films that are not up to their usual production standards. I approach my task this afternoon in that spirit.

The production under debate does not meet that high standard of excellence we have come to expect from the National Film Board. While it purports to be a factual, well-researched documentary about one of the nation's heroes it is, on the contrary, provably and demonstrably, a flawed, badly-botched production which should never have been released in its present form. I find it difficult to believe that this production, complete with inaccuracies, historical and otherwise, has been shown, we are advised, at embassies throughout the world as an example of Canadian film excellence. Surely, there are other and superior productions that the NFB might be expected to show to audiences offshore.

The subcommittee studying this matter heard a great deal of evidence. I, for one, cannot understand why it was necessary for Mr. Cowan supported by the National Film Board to designate the life of Billy Bishop as a device to attack what they believe to be the insanities of war, why it was necessary to savage and victimize a man who, beyond any doubt, did a great deal for his country, and, particularly, a man who is not here to defend himself. Bishop is gone; most of his contemporaries and colleagues have now passed away. Understandably, members of his family have been deeply offended by this film. At no point did the National Film Board or Mr. Cowan ever invite them to a meeting, invite them to provide their insights and their views with respect to the late Billy Bishop.

At the very least, why did not the National Film Board develop some fictional character? They could have developed a perfectly acceptable film relating to war and the way it alters men and women without using the name of Billy Bishop. Many other countries have done this sort of thing—France for one, where a number of anti-war post-war film productions were produced with indirect reference to certain French leaders during the first world war. However, the names were changed to avoid the kind of unhappy results which have ensued as a result of designating the life of one of Canada's great war heroes as the theme of this production under debate. In "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," Mr. Cowan and the NFB have chosen another—in my view—disreputable route. They have taken a legitimate and respected Canadian hero, carefully shaped the facts—and oh, yes, it is all done in the name of creative licence for they say creative artists must be given "some space"; they have to be given the opportunity to be creative, "to draw on their full imaginative powers"—and invented, quite shamelessly, incidents that never occurred. These are some of the kinder criticisms that can be levelled. They have put words into the mouths of people who never uttered them. They have worked tirelessly to destroy the reputation of one who is not here to defend himself, and they have proceeded to suggest to the nation and some of their defenders that the Senate is "interfering" with a great creative work, that a group of people in this chamber somehow are threatening free speech.

Yes, Mr. Cowan has his defenders. One is a best selling popular Canadian historian. I can only hope that this historian's research methods reflect a greater respect for the truth. I am sure that the French, for example, will be rather interested to learn that the Battle of Verdun was not fought in 1916 at all, and that the armies of France did not nearly bleed to death in 1916, that Verdun was really fought in 1917. Why this date change? Presumably because it seemed to tie in more effectively with the Billy Bishop plot. Creative licence?—Or shoddy research?

All the mistakes in this production—and there are legions of them, and at the risk of tedium, I shall read them into the record today—would have been avoidable and correctable with a minimum of technical and historical advice. When any group or agency, particularly one financed by the taxpayers, aspires to produce films about this country's heroes or even those who have served in somewhat less than heroic capacities, an official agency of the government, as a first requirement, should be required to ascertain the authenticity of the facts that it purports to be true. What kind of technical advice did the National Film Board and Mr. Cowan retain? One Dominique Parent is listed in the film credits as being responsible for historical research. This person was not heard from or referred to by those who appeared before the committee. The committee said that on the basis of its hearings Mr. Cowan, who it concludes is without any kind of historical training and whose experience is totally in broadcast journalism, was responsible for doing all or almost all the research.

I mentioned a moment ago that I would quote some instances of Mr. Cowan's inadequate "research." I shall proceed to do that now. Those who are members of the committee may say, "Well, you are going over old ground." I ask them to be tolerant. I think that the facts should be placed on the record of the Senate.

● (1500)

Another quotation that I take from the script of "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss"—and I may say to you, honourable senators, that this document is full of all sorts of historical errors, and other mistakes including the way the names of people and aircraft are spelled. The script says:

Corporal Walter Bourne is in charge of Bishop's machine.

Earlier, the script says:

Bishop finds himself and his horse mired in the awful French mud.

Billy Bishop at no time served in the cavalry in France. So, that is an untruth. Furthermore, Walter Bourne never served in the 21st Squadron. That should not have been a difficult matter to ascertain.

Then on page 13 of the transcript, we learn that:

Lady Saint Hellier is London's leading socialite and a close friend of just about everyone. She sees Bishop as a replacement for the son she's lost in the Crimean War.

Honourable senators, the Crimean War was back in 1854. She must have given birth at the age of nine years. That must be a new Commonwealth and Empire record.

I am sorry to burden some members of the committee with these facts, but I think it should be put on the record of the Senate because some of the commentators are wondering why the Senate is concerned.

On page 21 of the script, we find the words:

Scott likes Bishop's spunk and is giving him one patrol before sending him back.

The following morning, at five-thirty, the planes are wheeled out of the hangar.

What are the facts? On Bishop's first victory sortie, we have the statement:

The following morning, at five-thirty, the planes are wheeled out of the hangar.

That is not true. On that raid, Bishop took off at 4.30 in the afternoon. The changed time was better for the producer, and his film production, obviously.

There seems to be a rather intense interest on the part of Mr. Cowan in Baron von Richthofen, since he is portrayed in the most sympathetic terms. On page 25, we are told about the Baron's victories:

Victories 32, 33 and 34 come in the next three days.

In fact, they did not come within three days; they came within eight days. It is a small matter, but it indicates the carelessness that is rife throughout this entire production.

On page 26 of the script, we are told:

Billy Bishop, however, is learning how to fight. He gets victory number 2 the day after his first. And on Easter Sunday, 1917, he brings down an extraordinary three more to get the five kills needed to be called 'an Ace'.

That afternoon there's a celebration for Bishop attended by none other than Scott's good friend, the influential General Hugh Trenchard.

In fact, Bishop got victory number two on the sixth day after his first victory. With respect to Easter Sunday, 1917, there was no celebration. Trenchard attended a luncheon at 60th Squadron on April 22, 1917. In fact, Easter Sunday was April 7, 1917.

The script makes reference to an Edward Albert Ball. No such person ever existed, and certainly not by that name. There was a person who was known simply as Albert Ball. On page 29 of the script, we are told that:

By the end of Bloody April, most of Bishop's friends are wounded or dead. Bishop is an emotional lad and the losses hurt him deeply. With the exception of Jack Scott, he allows himself no more close friends . . . He now has 7 victories.

In fact, Bishop had 14 victories by the end of April, 1917. I wonder who Cowan talked to.

Again on page 32 of the script, we are told:

This same week in the north of France, the King and Queen of England visit their hero—Albert Ball and an up-and-comer named Jimmy McCudden.

No such meeting ever took place. Ball met the King in April of 1918. This seems to be a convenient shifting of the facts.

On page 33 of the script, we read:

Billy Bishop is not in the same league with the best of the Aces, but his score has climbed to 18 and the Owen Sound son now champions his cause, boasting that he brought down 7 in one flight, although in fact, it was 3.

With respect to the statement "Bishop's score has climbed to 18": Bishop had 14 victories by the end of the April, 1917. The transcript had earlier stated that Bishop had seven victories at that time.

Then on page 37, we are told:

The day is May 10th, 1917.

What a cinematic opportunity!

Final preparations are underway for a full card of dog-fighting which is now so popular that the fights and results are published daily throughout the warring nations. Though no one knows it yet, May 10th will be a very special day, for it is on this day when the two most daring fighters will finally meet. Billy Bishop and Manfred von Richthofen.

That confrontation would certainly have dwarfed something like Mohammed Ali fighting Larry Holmes. It is claimed to have been the big aerial "showdown". The only thing is that it never happened. Bishop was on leave in England at the time. In fact, he was on leave in England from May 8 to May 22, so when they talk in terms of "this great encounter", it never happened!

Senator Frith: Perhaps von Richthofen was fighting Snoopy.

Senator Perrault: Yes, very possibly. On page 40 of the script we read:

Billy Bishop and Jimmy McCudden are now the R.F.C.'s leading scorers.

And this is pure fantasy, honourable senators. In fact, Bishop had 47 victories in August of 1917 and Jimmy McCudden had nine. The only thing is that many other R.F.C. pilots had more than nine victories. One can only presume that Mr. Cowan obtained this garbled information from the same sources who provided information about Billy Bishop.

[Senator Perrault.]

On page 41 of the script, we are told:

The Red Baron now has 80 kills and at least that many offers of marriage.

Von Richthofen had 52 victories by June of 1917, the period in question. He did not have 80 kills at all. Further down the page, we are told that von Richthofen on June 10 is badly hit in the head and, a month later, barely recovered, the Baron starts his comeback and goes on his last fatal sortie.

In fact, von Richthofen was injured in 1916, two years before he was killed in April, 1918. That is just fanciful comment by Cowan.

On page 44 of the script, we are told:

Despite the Red Baron's death, there are no happy faces at 60 Squadron. And Bishop writes: My nerves won't last 3 more months. I find myself shuddering at chances I wouldn't think of 6 weeks ago.

Von Richthofen died in 1918, and Bishop had left France in 1917, to return approximately one month after von Richthofen's death. I suppose this is again "creative licence."

On page 45 of the script:

Bishop is now ordered on leave to Canada. He is two kills ahead of Jimmy McCudden for Number One, but the constant fighting has left him a nervous wreck.

When Bishop requested leave to proceed to Canada to be married, he had 47 victories and McCudden had nine. He was not just two ahead at all; he was 38 ahead. This, to me, indicates such a basic lack of research into the aerial history of World War I that it is absolutely appalling and certainly unacceptable.

At page 45 of the script again, we read:

His fears are revived however, when he lands. The same crowds that once saw the Caledonia off, again jam the port. Only now, they're for him.

With respect to crowds jamming the airport, Bishop had received the V.C. the D.S.O. and bar and M.C. before his return to Canada on leave. He was the outstanding allied aviator, so the crowds are not surprising. However, the film has not yet presented Bishop's V.C. raid.

On page 46, we are told:

On June 14th, Bishop departs London for the front, while Lady Saint Hellier and several members of royalty, cheer lustily.

In fact, Bishop returned to the front in 1918, not 1917, as indicated in the film, and he returned in May, not June. This film shows him leaving England on June 14 but, in fact, his raid on Estourmel took place on June 2.

On page 47 of the script—and I am sure the French Air Force will be interested in this, because it is incredible stuff:

In October, Bishop is fighting again and with McCudden dead he is soon Number One. He is a reckless fighter now and his plane is often hit.

The script then talks about other aces in the First World War. The French Ace, Guynemer is asked:

'What medal is there left for you to earn'. He replies: 'Only the Wooden Cross'. Two days later, Georges Guynemer is dead. Nungesser, the Number Two French Ace is the next hero to pay for celebrity with his life. And Navar, the Number Three man, cracks and is sent to a mental hospital where he commits suicide.

All nonsense! Creative licence? Or blatant untruth?

● (1510)

There is no evidence to support the statements that Bishop was a reckless fighter. Certainly his effectiveness continued unabated.

As far as Guynemer, Navar and these others are concerned, as well as the leading French and Allied ace, René Fonck, who had 75 victories, they are not mentioned. Nungesser died in a solo transatlantic flight attempt east to west well after the war. Navar was killed in a flying accident while practising for a 1919 victory parade in Paris. This is the quality of research that has led to this damnation of Billy Bishop, the Canadian ace! These facts regarding the French "aces" are so basic in nature, and so easily ascertainable from World War I records that doubt is cast on the validity of the entire Cowan production and its historical integrity.

At page 48 there is a further build up to the allegedly nefarious, phony act by Bishop, this so-called "raid that did not take place" where Bishop is supposed to have headed his plane into the "wild blue yonder," landed his plane, shot it up, took off the machine gun and came back and said he had just finished raiding a German airfield. These are the mischievous words:

Miraculously, Bishop is still alive. But he is now more valuable as a symbol than a fighter. The brass decide to pull him out.

The suggestion here is that there is complicity, that the so-called brass have to help arrange a phony raid so that Bishop can be awarded the Victoria Cross.

It goes on to state:

Knowing he has only a week left, Bishop decides to finally attempt the lone raid Ball dreamed of. He orders extra rounds to be loaded into his Newport. He tells Bourne to tune his machine and stress the wires tight. He then leaves a 3 a.m. wake-up call and goes to bed without talking to anyone.

Then this mysterious unidentified voice on the sound track states:

When Bishop did that raid on Estourmel that morning, did you have any idea it was coming?

And the other voice says:

Everybody knew it was coming. I mean we were up to here in brass hats, you know. I mean we were all standing out in the field, you know, waiting for him to come back to see if he had done it, you know. He had everything but a brass band out there, you know. I mean, I thought the King was coming.

That is a lie. The fact is that Bishop returned at 5.40 in the morning to the still-sleeping huts of his home airfield. There were no visitors to greet him on landing, there was no general knowledge that he was on a raid, although he had invited another pilot to come along with him. That was in the evidence as well, but his fellow flier declined. There was no general knowledge that Bishop would be going on the raid except that he had been encouraged by a Squadron Commander to take care of a particularly troublesome situation which had faced our troops in the trenches in the early morning hours.

No evidence is now available, but some historians believe that a lone German raider was making a practice of rousing our trenches at dawn by strafing attacks. It was believed that he was based at Estourmel.

So, the entire scenario is fiction, constructed by Cowan and the National Film Board to make it look as though the raid was deliberately pre-arranged and that they had a welcoming back party with a brass band, brass hats, and all the rest. And this is done in the name of "creative freedom and "creative licence." Why do this to Bishop's memory? Why injure his family today?

There are more inaccuracies that should be drawn to the attention of the Senate. I know some honourable senators know of these, but I want to put the following on the official record. At page 57 it states:

In 1939, Billy Bishop is once again in uniform. He is one of the brass now, a Lieutenant Colonel, and his renown as a hero is used to recruit the young men who will pilot the Spitfires in World War Two.

They could have ascertained, by contacting the Department of National Defence, that he was made an Air Marshall in 1938.

There are other discrepancies, and I will put those on the record as well. I do not want to delay honourable senators unduly, but there have been some comments made in the press about how unfair the Senate has been in its judgment.

Hon. C. William Doody: (Deputy Leader of the Government): What document are you quoting from? Is that the script?

Senator Perrault: I am quoting from an analysis done by a military historian. The facts, dates and times have been assembled.

Senator Doody: But when you refer to page 46, what is it you are referring to?

Senator Perrault: I am referring to page 46 of the transcript of "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" provided by the National Film Board. I believe it is referred to as the "shooting script".

With respect to what one might call misleading errors, at page 5 the following appears:

The declaration of war in 1914 had induced the Canadian Army to commission even its poorest prospects. So, in September Billy Bishop is commissioned a lieutenant and starts serious training with Toronto's and Mississauga horse.

The fact is that in 1914 standards for obtaining a commission in the Canadian Army were not lowered. The case is obviously being made against the quality of Canada's military officers at that time. They were top quality people in 1914, and anyone who knows anything about military history knows this to be a fact.

Then further in the script the narrator states:

In a month, Bishop is on a troop train speeding to Montreal. The talk, of course, is all war. But since there has been peace for two generations, nobody knows exactly what war is like.

The case is being made here against Bishop's qualifications and the chronology is being twisted to fit the later events.

On page 6 of the shooting script we are told:

And in November, Billy Bishop mounts the gangplank of the S.S. Caledonia to seek his share of that most worthy commodity.

That "most worthy commodity" was glory. That is a further manipulation of the chronology. The dates have been changed in order to suit the shooting script.

At page 7 of the script, the following appears:

On the morning of the 14th day, Bishop is horrified to see a U-boat surface 500 yards away. By eleven, the U-boat will have picked-off two of the convoy's ships and sent three hundred men to their death.

Is that not a great shooting situation? It goes on to state:

Bishop vomits at the sight. It is nothing compared to France.

A lie! Bishop did not witness any sinking at all during the crossing. Obviously, the comment about Bishop vomiting is designed to make him look like a weak character.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Is my honourable friend saying that the film showed the sinking of a ship and Billy Bishop vomiting when it never took place?

Senator Perrault: I do not think the film showed the actual physical action by Bishop, but in many of these cases there is voice-over and visual material which had been obtained from a number of sources.

At page 11 of the script they talk about the death of an Australian at the squadron headquarters. The mysterious unidentified voice asks:

What was Bishop's reaction to that death?

Then, that ever-present voice says:

Well, he bawled his eyes out, I mean . . . I mean we all did, you know.

Pure imagination! The fact is that an Australian was wounded in action during that period of time, but he lived to fly again and became vigorously healthy in the process. Again, Bishop is shown to be a rather weak, emotional and unreliable person.

They keep talking about his vomiting, his weaknesses and his nerves. At page 12 it states:

After three very undistinguished months with 21 Squadron, Bishop's nerves are shot and he is being sent to London to recuperate. He is still only an observer and although he yearns to become a pilot, his chances are slim. Pilots come only from the British upper class. Colonialists need not apply.

● (1520)

Again a reflection on Bishop's character. Qualified colonials, incidentally, were always welcomed into the RFC. That is a matter of historical fact. By the end of the war one third of the RFC air crew personnel were Canadian and served with splendid distinction along with Bishop.

A case is being made for a degree of class difference here, of course, which suits, apparently, the shooting purposes of the producer. Listen to this:

Shortly after he had finished his first three months in 21 Squadron, Bishop, on leave, coming out at night from the Savoy Hotel, fell down the steps and broke his arm.

The suggestion there is that he might have been inebriated.

He was immediately taken to this wonderful hospital in London in Bryanston's Square run by society ladies for the Royal Flying Corps. And a few days later a nurse came 'round and said: "The King's going to visit us. Now, we certainly can't have you here when the King comes to your bed and you say I fell down the steps at the Savoy. We must put a bandage around your head,—

Great stuff! He didn't fall down the Savoy steps. He was injured in the leg when he was a pilot flying with another pilot named Neville, and he crashed on landing. Bishop aggravated that injury in England and had to be hospitalized. As told by Cowan with the facts re-shaped, this is hardly an event to improve the reputation of Billy Bishop.

Then we are told on page 15 of the transcript:

Well, I've got to take a contradictory bit there says this mysterious voice.

he wasn't a good pilot to begin with. He was a lousy pilot.

This is an excerpt from a lengthy interview with Bishop's son, Arthur, who went on in the interview to the effect that although his father was a so-called "lousy" pilot in the beginning, he obviously became very accomplished. Of course the film was edited to be as unfair as possible to Billy Bishop.

We are told on page 18 of the shooting script about his first solo flight and we read the words:

Then you start bouncing across the field. And on your own power—and headed up into the wind—

Rudder—elevator—aileron—heart—

I open the throttle all the way—

And you're off—pull back the stick—harder—harder—

First solo flight, greatest day in a man's life.

Says this voice.

On February 16th, 1917, Billy Bishop receives the Wings if not exactly the blessings of the RFC

The implication here is that Bishop crashed on his first solo flight—that's the inference, but it is not true at all.

Then, of course, in 1916—I have already covered that—in June the Germans attacked the French fortress at Verdun. That happened in 1916, not 1917. They talk about the threatened mutiny of the French army in the shooting script, which occurred in 1916, not 1917.

On page 20 it states:

Though a good sport, Bishop is anything but an ace as he arrives at his first posting in northern France. He brings with him a lamentable record; he has only received a slight shrapnel wound; he has never fired on an enemy plane and he has committed numerous acts of insubordination.

There is no record of any act of military insubordination committed by Bishop. Again, Bishop's reputation is being tarnished unjustly in this film. Why make a statement of that kind to defame the memory of one of our great Canadian aces? Why do that? Would Mr. Cowan appreciate an attack of that nature on his grandfather without any prior effort to ascertain what the facts really were, and without speaking to any member of his family?

Then we read on page 24 about von Richthofen and his habit to land and pick up I.D. numbers for his collection for the people he shot down.

von Richthofen had a collection of aircraft number plates or engine number plates—he did not have a collection of I.D. numbers of his victims.

Apparently the effect being attempted here is to suggest that people become heartless and soul-less as a result of exposure to war. That is the inference.

On page 26 we read the words:

Bishop, it seems, is learning how to fight rather quickly, but more importantly Jack Scott is teaching him how to get ahead.

The fact is that Bishop's squadron commander, Jack Scott, was a very highly respected pilot and gentleman. He was also a barrister. There is no evidence whatsoever that he encouraged Bishop to perform other than correctly as a pilot and as a gentleman. This is another attempt in the film to show a pattern of collusion between Scott and Bishop which might have led to spurious "raids" that resulted in false aerial victories.

We see on page 35 of the shooting script—and this is one of the more serious points—this mysterious voice says:

Yesterday, when I was at the Imperial War Museum, one of the tapes I listened to was by a pilot by the name of A. James. He said that he thought Bishop's record was fraudulent—that Bishop's record was fraudulent.

—Fragile.

Another voice says:

Fraudulent. A fraud.

—Oh yes. Fraudulent.

This is uttered over and over again for maximum effect.

He did not in fact have that number of kills. He thought that Bishop was a very ambitious man and was cheating on his kills and that people .. he said it was generally known in the RFC that Bishop was cheating.

These are remarks supposedly drawn together by Cowan.

There is no evidence available to support a claim that anyone in the RFC believed during the Great War that Bishop was cheating. There is much evidence from his remaining comrade that Bishop's record is no less valid than that of any other RFC, RNAS pilot, and just as valid as any of the German records, Austrian records, Italian records, French records or American records in the First World War.

Among those consulted by researchers on this point between 1983 and 1986 are Roger Neville, Bishop's pilot in 21 Squadron; Tim Hervey, an officer who served on Bishop's flight on 60 Squadron; and J.B. Crompton, another officer who served with Bishop on 60 Squadron.

The only 1917 contemporary of Bishop's who, according to Paul Cowan, now alleges that Bishop was fraudulent, is Wing Commander W.M. Fry M.C., who, significantly, stated in 1974 that everyone believed implicitly in Bishop's honesty. Mr. Cowan in fact does not quote Mr. Fry in this film, nor is he listed in the film credits.

So, it is alleged that Mr. Fry now says that Bishop was fraudulent. Mr. Fry is yet another absent and mysterious witness. Apparently Fry is too ill to travel or cannot make arrangements, or has other commitments and cannot come to Ottawa to testify. In any case, whatever Cowan's claims today, Fry in 1974 told the world that he believed implicitly in Bishop's honesty.

An individual who has studied 60 Squadron history extensively, retired Squadron Leader D.W. Warne, RAF, is said to have stated that he found that many of 60 Squadron's 1917 personnel doubted Bishop's word in 1917. He has not brought forward a shred of evidence of such doubt to the public. If he has brought it forward to Mr. Cowan, it is not identified in the film.

Mr. Warne, like Mr. Fry, is not quoted in the film, nor is he listed in the credits, despite the fact that Mr. Cowan acknowledges having received extensive anti-Bishop information from him. Without supporting evidence, Mr. Cowan defames Bishop's professional reputation.

Then we read on page 36 of this transcript:

Bishop's squadron has now been positioned just opposite the Red Baron's. But Bishop is flying even more apart from his squadron—lone stuff he calls it.

The suggestion there is that he takes off alone because he can come back and claim kills that did not take place and add further to his total.

Now, what are the facts? The suggestion is that this was some sort of unilateral decision by Bishop to fly by himself. He was officially authorized as a roving commission. In other words, he could fly when and where he chose. His record was such that he could do this. Such authority was very rare indeed.

In the advertising flyer for the film the National Film Board states that Bishop often flew on unauthorized missions. A case is attempted to show that Bishop acted without authority in the air, presumably to enable him to run up his score of victories. That is incorrect. They were totally authorized missions. On page 36, the shooting script says:

In his first 60 days, he's had 60 fights and brought down 36 planes. The only dark spot is that some members of 60 Squadron are now whispering that Bishop's getting credit for a lot of kills for which there is no confirmation. This is perhaps due to jealousy over Bishop's decorations, but the rumours persist.

The latter part of the quotation is an extract from the film where the character, Bourne, is speaking. The fact is that the real Walter Bourne is not known to have made any such statement or expressed any such charge. So, there is no foundation in fact for any part of the statement. There was no Carlisle in 60 Squadron in 1917, nor in Bishop's 85 Squadron in 1918. That could have been ascertained easily with a minimum of effort on the part of the producers.

● (1530)

Along with the preceding observations, this is the heart of the concocted argument against Bishop. Major Scott, commanding officer, was, in some fashion, supposed to have been in collusion with Bishop to enhance Bishop's score. Bishop flew on unauthorized solo raids and he was being given credit for unconfirmed victories. This is the thrust of this discredited attack by Cowan.

Again, at page 40, we are told:

Billy Bishop and Jimmy McCudden are now the RFC's leading scorers. Bishop writes: I'm quite famous now. Two French Airmen told me all sorts of lies they read about me in the French papers which of course can't be true.

We do not have a copy of those French papers either. The script goes on to state:

And, he adds, I have a real hair-raising stunt in mind, one that could get me another decoration.

Again, honourable senators, listen to these words that are blatantly being put into Bishop's mouth. He is purported to have said:

I have a real hair-raising stunt in mind, one that could get me another decoration.

Obviously, he is supposed to be planning the so-called false lone aerodrome attack. Meanwhile, we are told, "the doubts about Bishop are increasing."

—the defence patrols have come back—six or seven machines, they hadn't seen anything—nothing. He goes out a little later, by himself; comes back in a couple of hours, you know, he's firing off his flare guns like it's bleeding Guy Fawkes Day, claiming he shot down one; two; three planes. Well he claimed he shot them down but it was the C.O. who was Major Scott, he's the one that gave it to him.

This is, supposedly, the voice of Bourne. They are words that Bourne never said and never claimed to have said.

Bishop's file of combat reports in Kew, London, reflects the fact that he made many more claims of victory than those with which he was officially credited, because they checked them out as carefully as possible. If there were any doubt, they would reject those claims. The simple fact is that of those claims made 47 were confirmed and recognized by the Royal Flying Corps in 1917. If Major Scott was in collusion with Bishop and granted him victories without confirmation, how would the skeptics explain those of Bishop's claims which were not recognized by Major Scott or higher authority?

Further to the preceding conclusion, this part of the film seems to be a deliberate attempt, without any evidence whatsoever, to use Walter Bourne to destroy Bishop's credibility. The film placed Bourne in an aerodrome setting, no doubt to reinforce credibility.

At page 42 we are told about the Red Baron who was supposedly in a weakened condition because of his accident. The script states:

While the Red Baron tries desperately to get May, another Canadian, Roy Brown, puts one bullet into von Richthofen's back.

What a subject of sympathy! The weakened Baron von Richthofen, who came out of hospital too soon after his injuries—which had been moved a year to accommodate the script and apparently to arouse sympathy for the Baron—was shot in the back by a Canadian airman. Tell that to the Australians. The Australians claim that because the trajectory of the bullet was from the ground, he must have been hit from below by an Australian rifle. That did not bother Mr. Cowan or the National Film Board; they wanted that Canadian to shoot von Richthofen in the back—a nice, honourable way to kill an opponent, particularly one in a weakened, pain-wracked condition.

This script goes on to state:

Just about all that's left intact of the Baron's Faulker are the twin spandau machine guns which have ended the lives of a hundred young men.

The Red Baron's face remains intact, despite the crash. The remaining morsels are quickly devoured by souvenir hunters.

The effort here is to depict people who have been dehumanized by war as grabbing everything in sight, that is, all the souvenirs. The fact of the matter is that Baron von Richthofen's body was treated with the same degree of respect that was awarded to all enemy or friendly aviators in the war and the highest standards of civility and respect were observed.

Is this an attempt again to show the alleged inhuman, brutalizing nature of warfare? His conclusion, perhaps, is laudable, but his arguments to reach the conclusion are not historically valid.

We are told at page 50:

Later there will be many doubts about the Estourmel raid, although no pilot in 60 Squadron will ever publicly discuss the incident. One of the most baffling questions—so says this aeronautical “expert,” Mr. Cowan, and his associates at the NFB who are so wise in the way of aircraft technology—is why Bishop’s Newport returned with its Lewis gun missing.

Again, as in many instances, “Nieuport” is misspelled “Newport.”

This is, again, the prelude to a monologue by Bourne concerning the gun, which is all imaginary, of course. Certainly, if one man could install the gun, one man could remove it. Removing it while also controlling the aircraft in the air, however, is another question. Bishop tells of having rotated the gun down through 90 degrees to install a new drum of ammunition on the flight in question. However, he could not install the new drum, so he threw it overboard. Then, because the gun was useless without ammunition and created a slowing effect because of its drag in the airstream, he unfastened the gun and also threw it overboard. At the time, he was being pursued by some German fighter planes.

This action may, in fact, have been less effective than it is now perceived to be, but it was not an unknown tactic in 1917. Certainly, it would have been known to the real Walter Bourne, although we do not have any statement on the subject from him. Because there is no statement from Bourne on the subject of the missing gun and because this particular facet of the Bishop story is critical, Mr. Cowan ought not to have introduced Walter Bourne in an effort to show that Bishop’s action was very improbable.

Technicians and historians agree that it would not have been impossible for Bishop to have removed and discarded his Lewis gun in flight. Mr. Cowan’s suggestion to the contrary is deliberately misleading. Is it introduced to further erode Bishop’s honesty?

On page 51, Bishop’s plane is described as returning in tatters. Here we have more “creative licence.” This bald, dramatic statement in the film is so forceful that when the author places words in Bourne’s mouth which Bourne follows up with his information about “17 bullet holes in the tail . . . all in a nice little group,” the viewer is led to believe that there was no other damage to the aircraft. However, according to Major Scott’s remarks in the Combat Report, two bays of the lower main plane had been shot away and there, obviously, would have been damage to the skin of the aircraft in the fuselage area.

If nowhere else in the film, the official record of the day, that is, a copy of the Combat Report which Bishop completed immediately following his lone raid, ought to have been introduced at this point, provided that the film producer wished to produce a balanced documentary, docu-drama, report, or however it may be described. Not to have introduced the official record of the day at this point leads inevitably to the conclusion that Mr. Cowan chose deliberately to mislead the viewer into a false conclusion about Bishop’s fundamental honesty.

On page 52 of the script, we are told the following:

The Germans keep meticulous records at all their aerodromes. Historians will later find Estourmel’s records and there will be no mention of any raid. They will also scour the records of other aerodromes in the area with the same result. The brass who are waiting for Bishop, however, harbour no doubts. They will recommend him for the Victoria Cross, even though they can discover no confirmation whatsoever of the raid.

The Germans never had any doubt about his greatness. After the war, he was honoured by his former enemies who acknowledged his greatness, because they had met him in combat. The people who question his honesty, sadly, are those right in our own country in the person of Mr. Cowan and some of his gaggle of supporters at the National Film Board.

● (1540)

The fact was that no aerodrome records, as such, were ever kept by either side during the Great War. Squadron records, however, were very strictly maintained and were the basis of wing records, the next higher level, then of group, brigade and army records as the squadron activity information was passed along upwards.

At the conclusion of the Great War, many squadron diaries simply disappeared through destruction, loss and so on. However, some of the higher level records of group or army formations remain. In the 1930s, all of these records were concentrated in east Germany, except for those of the Bavarian squadrons, which were concentrated in Munich. During the action of the Second World War, most of the records of the German air force were lost through allied bombing action. What remains is now in Russian hands.

The German air force archival organization will not give any official information on Bishop, because it has none. Individually, as airmen, of course, they are aware of Billy Bishop and the generalities of the Great War career of the man they called the “White Knight”. Honourable senators, Bishop was called “the White Knight” by the Germans who respected his incredible fighting qualities. Nevertheless, Mr. Cowan and the National Film Board call him a liar and a cheat.

Collectively, through their archival organization, the Germans have nothing to present to researchers. This applies to any and all researchers who have been working since 1930, including the “experts” cited by Mr. Cowan and Mr. Symansky, who was mentioned in the report.

In his testimony, for example, Mr. Cowan stated that a Mr. Ed Ferko told him that records of Jasta 20 are “extensive and quite complete.” The same Mr. Ferko admits that his Jasta 20 notes failed to show much activity between May 27 and July 11, 1917, because “when Tornuss took the notes from the original Jasta 20 records, there was nothing of worth there other than personnel movement in and out of the unit.”

We know that Jasta 20 was ordered from the second German army on the Somme on May 27 to the fourth German army at Flanders. We know that they would have staged through an airfield in the Cambrai/Estourmel area and we know that the weather was not suitable for such a move until June 1. It is conjecture to assume that Jasta 20 was the outfit attacked by Bishop on June 2 near Cambrai, but it is entirely possible, even probable, that it was. That there was "nothing of worth" in the Jasta 20 diary during the period of May 27 to July 11, 1917, leads inevitably to the conclusion that the diary is either missing or was simply not completed during this period of transfer activity.

Certainly, in theory, the Germans kept "meticulous records." In practice, there are serious and extensive gaps in the German information on record for reasons of human failure, or because of loss or destruction of the records. These extensive gaps are acknowledged by the official German air force archival organization in Freiburg and by all leading historians of the Great War.

Mr. Cowan did not present any "hard copy" of evidence from Mr. Ferko which would show that Jasta 20 records are "extensive and quite complete." One is led to the conclusion that the records are neither extensive nor complete, or else they are missing, as is believed by the German air force archives and by leading Great War historians. Again, in Germany, this great Canadian ace is respected and honoured by his former enemies. Bishop was known as the White Knight in Germany. Today he is pilloried in Canada by an agency of government. That is shocking and unacceptable.

At page 54 of the script, the narrator states:

On August 11th, 1917, Billy Bishop receives his Victoria Cross for the Estourmel raid, along with the Distinguished Service Order and Military Cross. The King said the one thing he's always wanted is to give the three awards at the same time—and the King generally gets what he wants.

Through the use of an almost frivolous set of circumstances, the viewer is led to believe that the King somehow promoted the simultaneous awarding of the V.C., the D.S.O. and the M.C. to Bishop not because of any merit due to Bishop, but on a whim of the King. The viewer is led to believe that Bishop's awards were "manufactured" to suit the King's expressed desire. Probably, when it became known to the King that he would be presenting the three awards to one individual on the same investiture parade, the King expressed his great satisfaction.

Of further interest, from the point of view of the structure of the film, is the fact that Mr. Cowan testified that he had used less than "seven or eight minutes" of John Gray's play "Billy Bishop Goes to War" in the film. Mr. Cowan stated that he had been contractually authorized to use 15 minutes or less of the play. In fact, there are some 22 minutes of the John Gray production in Mr. Cowan's film.

Honourable senators, there are a number of other inaccuracies in the script, but I will not cite further examples. I want to conclude by making some personal remarks. So it goes, honourable senators, line after line, paragraph after paragraph of invented, shaded and re-shaped "facts". The script is dripping with innuendo of the worst kind. Some words are manipulative; others are pure fiction, and still others are placed in the mouths of those such as Bourne—who never uttered them—to develop the case that Billy Bishop was a liar, a cheat and a scallywag. Oh, they will deny it; they will say that it is not as bad as it looks. Honourable senators, this damning with the faintest of praise! Professing to be objective, while aiming to destroy him. In that film, we have the allegation that Billy Bishop was more interested in achieving glory than in helping his comrades in that desperately cruel and difficult war.

There are those who suggest that the Senate is engaged in some kind of witch hunt, yet the burden of proof is clearly on Mr. Cowan and his defenders in the National Film Board and across the country. Their alleged proof is gossamer thin and just as insubstantial and elusive. Those they quote are either dead or profess to have memory lapses, travel problems or other things to do. They could not come here to testify. Members of Bishop's family were ignored apparently because they might have had some ideas or insights which would have endangered the damning scenario, yet the producer proclaims that his proof will "stand up." In a case of this kind, Mr. Cowan should be reminded that Billy Bishop, rather than being guilty until proven innocent, is innocent until proven guilty. The burden of proof rests not upon Bishop, who has made his honourable mark in history, but upon Cowan, the National Film Board and their shadowy coterie of alleged informants, who cannot be encouraged to come out into the open, into the light of day, where their negative mutterings can be tested.

Honourable senators, some have written about the quality of greatness. Longfellow wrote:

The heights by great men reached and kept
Were not attained by sudden flight,
But they, while their companions slept,
Were toiling upward in the night.

In the case of Billy Bishop, he was toiling upward in the night and in the morning. Carlyle said:

No sadder proof can be given by a man of his own littleness than disbelief in great men.

Disraeli said:

The defects of great men are the consolation of dunces.

Landon said:

Great men too often have greater faults than little men can find room for.

I think that all of those statements apply to Billy Bishop.

As I have said, the burden of proof rests not upon Bishop, who has made his honourable mark on history, but upon Cowan and the National Film Board. In his desperate effort to register a protest against what he sees as the insanity of war, it seems to me that Cowan has clearly rigged the evidence against Bishop. I believe that this "rigging" has been blatant and cynical. Recognized historical sources have been bypassed and ignored; Bishop's descendants have been ignored, and military historians have been ignored. At the very least, the taxpayer who put up the money for this film should not be asked to bankroll this masochistic frenzy—this effort to destroy the reputation of one who was honoured in his lifetime by the nation and honoured, as well, by his former enemies. Rather than retain the services of a qualified historian with some knowledge and sense concerning the events of 1914, I believe that Mr. Cowan and the National Film Board embarked upon a reckless, irresponsible course, and I think that the Senate report has been all too generous in its treatment of them. It makes reference to what is perceived to be sincerity. I do not think that truly sincere people write this kind of stuff.

If the case of Billy Bishop and Paul Cowan and the National Film Board were before the courts, Billy Bishop would be acquitted on all counts, with all costs assessed against the board and Cowan and with a formal apology to Bishop demanded by the court. If this were an aerial dogfight in the Great War, figuratively speaking, Cowan would be shot down in flames without a parachute.

If Mr. Cowan and the National Film Board were financed independently, one would be inclined to say, "Leave them to the discerning public; leave them to heaven." But there are public funds involved here. These are taxpayers' dollars, and the taxpayer has, in this case, financed defective goods which should, at the very least, be restored to some kind of marketable status so that he can rescue some of his investment.

The Senate recommendation should be the very minimum action to help right a grievous wrong. But I agree with the veterans across the country that the production should be withdrawn for extensive changes and revisions. I hope that never again will the National Film Board forget what its mandate is. It is a mandate to serve the national interest. It may be a mandate for creativity, but it is not a mandate to distort facts and injure the great people of this country.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, if no other honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate at this time, I move the adjournment of the debate on behalf of Senator Steuart.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question through Senator Tremblay, if I may be allowed to do so.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay, did you read the French translation of my speech?

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Indeed, Senator Le Moyne, I read the French translation of your speech.

Senator Le Moyne: May I express my regret?

[English]

Honourable senators, I am very tempted to raise this matter as a question of privilege. That translation is unspeakable. It is not translation; it is putting one through the meat grinder. I am ashamed of it. It is always the same thing, whenever something has to be translated from English into French. This is unbearable. It is no more respected than this empty house, where we are close to a quorum almost every day. I do not think it is necessary to go further; but I hope that at some time some corrective action will be taken so that we need not be afraid, every time we raise our voice in this house, to be ridiculed by the translation and by its unspeakable mediocrity.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Steuart, debate adjourned.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on Orders 6, 7 and 8, Senator Roblin wishes to inform honourable senators that he has nothing to say on these items. Therefore I assume that we will have to consider them as having been debated.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: I presume that His Honour the Speaker will simply put the motion.

Senator Doody: That is my understanding, and the department will then do whatever it has to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, these are motions and will have to be voted on.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt these motions?

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Nurgitz).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Nurgitz has had to leave. I believe that Senator Frith had certain comments that he wished to make in this regard, and Senator Nurgitz asks that Senator Frith should proceed. If Senator Frith is satisfied, the motion can then be put.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have read the intervention by Senator Nurgitz. The three points raised were as to the need to travel to obtain the information, the benefit that would come from travelling that could not come from making a study, and the question of the cost. On the first two items, I believe I was misinformed. Senator Nurgitz made it clear that it was not just a matter of taking a trip to study the performance of the committee in Australia, but that an invitation has been received to attend a conference at which all similar committees, both state and federal, will be participating. I believe that Senator Nurgitz made his case very well. At page 2322 of Debates of the Senate for April 17, in the third paragraph of the second column, he says:

Briefly, with respect to costs, I should like to indicate that the funds required by the committee in this respect have been detailed in the joint committee's budget for the 1986-87 fiscal year. That budget, if it has not yet been presented, is about to be presented to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration in the usual manner, so that senators will have the opportunity to examine what those proposed costs are.

He goes on to point out that the Senate's portion would be 30 per cent. So it seems to me that we are satisfied on all points except that; but, as Senator Nurgitz pointed out, technically we do not need the report of the Committee on Internal Economy before we deal with this, because the rule does not apply to a joint committee. However, as he also points out, we ought to comply with the spirit of that decision. I am sure he will have the figures for us next week, and then we can adopt this motion. I support it. But I would like to see the spirit of that decision we made regarding costs observed before we make the final decision. I will therefore adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Twenty-sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of National Finance), presented in the Senate on 17th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, in this case we need not only the spirit but also the black letter of that earlier order, and in order to proceed with that we need to have the figures. We had better stand this.

Orders stands.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations), tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Langlois).

Hon. William J. Petten: Stand until Wednesday next, April 30, 1986.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 4.30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gérard V. J. La Forest, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to provide borrowing authority (Bill C-99, Chapter 19, 1986)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

TWENTY-SIXTH and TWENTY-SEVENTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Twenty-sixth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of National Finance), presented in the Senate on 17th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Consideration of the Twenty-seventh Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of National Finance), presented in the Senate on 17th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, to revert to Orders Nos. 10 and 11 on the order paper, dealing with the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which, in turn, dealt with the supplementary budgets of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance.

Honourable senators, when these orders were called during the proceedings, I was not sure of their status. In fact, they have met all of our criteria and as for the checking of budgets and going through the procedures with Internal Economy, they do not require special powers because they already have those special powers. Therefore, there is no reason why we should not adopt those two reports at this time.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: On a point of order, I would like to ask whether the honourable senator was granted leave to revert to those items.

Senator Frith: I thought I asked for it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Was leave granted?

Senator Frith: The answer is no, I did not ask and I ought to have. I now do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I presumed that leave was granted.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, but we simply wanted to hear him ask for it.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that these reports be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, April 29, 1986 at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT

QUALITY OF TRANSLATION—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I wish to raise a very slight question of privilege. Towards the end of the sitting last Wednesday, I inexcusably lost my temper and was brusque and impatient, owing to a tremendous sense of frustration. I had first put a question to Senator Tremblay, and I hope my honourable colleague will accept my apologies and allow me to express my feelings of cordial respect.

[English]

Then, complaining about the translation of my speech of the preceding day, I lost my cool in a regrettable outburst. Of course, I remain very unhappy about that translation, but I could have expressed my grievance in a more restrained and even more equable way. So, I apologize to my honourable colleagues and to all concerned who might have been irritated or offended by my verbal intemperance.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: When shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Frith, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

MEETING IN ITALY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, May 6, 1986, I will call the attention of the Senate to the meetings of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association held in Italy from March 21 to 31, 1986.

NATIONAL POSTAL MUSEUM

ADVISORY COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I give notice that, on Thursday next, May 1, 1986, I will move:

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, pursuant to the new guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees, adopted by the Senate on March 26, I give notice that, on Tuesday next, May 6, 1986, I will move:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to provide a forum to examine, consider, evaluate, consolidate and synthesize available research, documentation and other information relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians;

That the Committee identify any areas where further study, research or investigation is called for;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than December 19, 1986.

Honourable senators, it is my intention to ask leave of the Senate to withdraw my previous motion, which stands at present in the name of Senator Sinclair, when that item is called later today.

ORDER OF CANADA

APPOINTMENT OF FORMER MEMBERS OF FEDERAL CABINET AND FORMER PROVINCIAL PREMIERS—ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION—POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before proceeding to Question Period, may I be permitted to draw the attention of honourable senators to a grievous omission—"grievous" for a New Brunswicker—in a reply that was given to a question that had been placed on the order paper by the Honourable Heath Macquarrie? The reply to the question is at page 2288 of Debates of the Senate for April 16, 1986. The question was asked as to what former members of the federal cabinet and former provincial Premiers had been appointed to the Order of Canada.

For the information of honourable senators, this matter was drawn to my attention by a former colleague of ours, namely, the Honourable Muriel McQueen Fergusson, a former Speaker of the Senate.

The omission is that of the name of the Honourable Milton F. Gregg, V.C., which was left off that list. I have checked with Mr. Nantel, the Director of Canadian Orders and Decorations at Government House, and he has confirmed that Brigadier Gregg was indeed appointed to the Order of Canada in December, 1967, and was made an officer of that order in 1972.

I might say that I have spoken also to the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to this matter, and I believe that he concurs with me that the record of the Senate should be corrected.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I thank my honourable friend for bringing this matter to our notice. We obtained the information from the Chancellor of the Order, and, for some reason or other, this omission occurred. I am glad that my honourable friend has corrected the record so that it may now be complete.

(See p. 2449 for revised reply)

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—AGRICULTURE— CONSULTATIONS WITH CANADIAN PRODUCERS

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, my question to the Leader of the Government is prompted by a release last week, by the Minister for International Trade, Mr. Kelleher, of the names of the heads of the consultative committees who would be advising on the upcoming free trade negotiations with the United States.

The name of the person who is heading the consultative committee dealing with agriculture, food and beverages, is Mr. Benoît Lavigne of Montreal. I am sure that Mr. Lavigne is a capable man, but I would ask the Leader of the Government if he would please take steps with his colleague or colleagues to ensure that any consultation in that committee shall include an adequate group of people from the producing sector. Mr. Lavigne himself is not from that sector.

I have in mind our experience with the Nielsen task force, where there was no representative of the producers' sector in a group of 10 people that formed the committee that was to advise Mr. Nielsen, with the exception of Mr. Runciman, who I believe was included because he was a former President of the United Grain Growers and, incidentally, had been a producer. In addition, in 10 pages of names of people with whom that group consulted, there was only one person listed as a farmer. There seemed to be minimal consultation with the producer groups.

My question to the Leader of the Government is: Will he please take steps to ensure that the consultative committee does, in fact, consult thoroughly and fully with the producer sector of Canadian agriculture?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I share my honourable friend's opinion as to the importance of agriculture's contribution toward the proceedings leading up to those negotiations. I shall see what I can find out for him as to the steps that are being taken to make sure that that very important segment of our economy is adequately consulted.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE-CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, on the question of an apology and partial compensation to Canadians of Japanese descent for acts against them by the government of the day during World War II, last week a Toronto Star article appeared reporting that the government was now considering a fund for directing some $10 million toward multi-racial problems of discrimination, but there would still not be any direct or partial compensation to citizens of Japanese descent whose rights were affected or diminished by the government during World War II, and without considering the views of Canadians of Japanese descent who have been actively lobbying the government on this question. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us an update on the government's views on this question?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the government's view is that reparations of some sort, an apology and perhaps some other measures, as well, ought to be considered in this case, which, of course, is a change from previous policy. That is a new approach to the matter, which the present administration has introduced. I know that my honourable friend would not expect me to comment on a newspaper report.

Senator Grafstein: Is the government now suggesting, despite the previous responses by the Leader of the Government in the Senate, that there will be some form of partial reparation made directly to citizens of Japanese descent? Am I clear on that issue?

Senator Roblin: No. I hope I did not leave honourable senators with that impression. In my mind the word "reparation" does not refer exclusively to money. It refers to other acts of recognition of the plight or, at least, of the situation that arose in the case of Japanese Canadians during World War II. I am not announcing government policy on the matter. That will be done by the minister concerned in due course.

Senator Grafstein: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate suggest to his colleagues in the cabinet that before their policy is announced, they take into consideration the views of Canadian citizens of Japanese descent who apparently are in the process of completing a report that might provide pertinent facts to the government's deliberations on this question?

Senator Roblin: The government wants to give the widest consideration to all who have a legitimate interest in this matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PROPOSED WHITE PAPER

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he tell us where the government stands now in the matter of the proposed white paper on National Defence? This white paper has been promised on a number of occasions by different ministers. Now the rumours are that we are not to get such a paper. Yet, the government is taking certain decisions in the field of national defence, some of them involving very substantial sums of money, and in fact, almost new directions insofar as some naval purchases are concerned. Are we going to get a white paper, and how soon?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I do not think I would agree with my honourable friend that the government has embarked on radically new changes of direction in terms of its defence policy. There may have been some changes, but they cannot be described in that way. This question was raised with the Minister of National Defence in the other place a few days ago, and he announced that he did not have in mind a date for releasing a white paper at the present time, but that he was giving some thought to the question as to when he would be able to do so.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—U.S. AGRICULTURE POLICY AS AGENDA ITEM—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On March 20, I asked the Leader of the Government the following question, as it is recorded at page 2207 of Hansard:

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform us whether there was discussion at the summit meeting between Prime Minister Mulroney and President Reagan of the agricultural policies of the United States?

The Leader went on to say that he would make inquiries. I would like to know if he has found out anything and can inform us now whether or not the Prime Minister of Canada in fact discussed with the President of the United States the adverse effect of their agricultural products policy on Canadian grain markets.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no answer to that question at the present time. I shall see what has happened to it. I can tell my honourable friend that during the recent meeting of the OECD in Europe that matter was raised by the Canadian delegation headed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and I can also tell him that it is on the agenda for the Tokyo Summit in Japan. So it is not being overlooked.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, I think that reply of the Leader of the Government is very significant. I have been watching the responses in the House of Commons, and it seems to me that the official position or the operating position of the Government of Canada is to direct no criticism against the United States but to direct all the criticism at the EEC. I hope the minister will bring us a reply. It is my suspicion that the matter was not raised at all, and I see no indication whatsoever that the government has seriously criticized the American grain subsidy program or has asked them to cease and desist. Essentially, it is the Americans who set the price level on world markets and not the EEC, because the United States is the big player. I think the Government of Canada's emphasis is in the wrong place. The EEC is certainly troublesome, but our main trouble is with the United States.

• (1420)

Senator Roblin: That is a debatable assertion, I think, when one remembers that the American policy to which we have such objection is a response to the policy of the EEC. The policy did not originate with the United States; it is a response to the EEC policy. I think if the EEC were to follow a policy that was more rational in terms of its exports of farm products and that did not involve enormous subsidies, the question of the United States policy would not be before us now.

However, I am not prepared to decide who is the bigger villain. I think we must go after both of them.

Senator Argue: I think the U.S. policy is in error and is misplaced, and will not really achieve very much for the United States. All it will do is bankrupt thousands of producers because of the lowering of international prices. I would therefore plead with the minister to insist, if he can, within the government circles, that the Americans be called to account for leading the attack.

Senator Roblin: I think I would have to be even-handed in this matter and object to both the EEC and the American policy.

NUCLEAR DISASTER

UKRAINE—EFFECTS OF RADIATION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I am sure that all of us have heard with alarm the news over the last two days of a nuclear leak from the Soviet reactor in Ukraine. At noon today, there were reports that as many as 2,100 people may have died as the initial result of that leak, and that a call has been made for medical assistance from western countries with expertise in radiation diseases.

Could the Leader of the Government give us any information that the Canadian government may have on this leak, and whether this country has been asked for assistance? I also ask if any increase in the radiation level has been detected in the northern areas of Canada.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My friend raises a very important question, and I can give her some information with respect to it. As far as we know, there are 18 Canadians in the Kiev region where this disaster appears to have taken place. Our officials in Moscow tell us that they believe all 18 are safe and well, which I am sure is something for which we are all very grateful.

At the present time, to my knowledge, we have not received a request from the Soviet authorities to help them with this problem. If we do get a request, we will respond as constructively as we can. I would also say that, to the best of my knowledge, at the moment no harmful effects have been detected in Canadian territory. Indeed, the information we have is that the effects noted in Scandinavia, while worrisome and unpleasant, are not in a category that could be described as fatal. Therefore we live in hope that our territory will not be adversely affected.

Senator Fairbairn: I thank the Leader of the Government for that information. I have a supplementary question. Since the report of this accident has come in, have any efforts been made to increase the regularity of the measurement of radiation levels in the Arctic region of Canada?

● (1425)

Senator Roblin: Without being an expert on the subject, I suspect that we do not monitor them as regularly as some might wish.

In order to make sure that I have the facts of the matter, I will ask my colleague what the status of those tests is so that my honourable friend may know.

LIBYA

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES AND BETWEEN CANADA AND WESTERN ALLIES—CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT IN OFFICIAL RECORD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I wish to respond to a point raised with me last Wednesday by the honourable the Leader of the Opposition with respect to my statements about meetings between the President and the Prime Minister. The first day I made a statement which is reasonably interpreted as replying that they had, and then two days later I am quoted in Hansard as replying in the negative.

The Leader of the Opposition, I think quite naturally, asked me which was correct. At the time I said that I had not read Hansard, but I have taken the opportunity to do so in the interval.

I find that in the Hansard “blues” my statement is:

I have already answered that one. I said that he hadn't.

Look at my previous answer

That is also what appears in Hansard.

When one examines the “blues”, however, one sees that the word “hadn't” is underlined and that there is a marginal note that says “Please confirm. Thank you.”

I had the opportunity of speaking with the Hansard reporter about this incident, and he told me, I think quite fairly, that in the rather vigorous exchange of opinion that was taking place at the time between the Leader of the Opposition and myself, and the speed with which at least one of us was speaking, he had had some difficulty following the exact words that were said. He records as his first hearing of what I said that I used the negative “hadn't”, but he put a line under it and raised the question because he was not sure that that is what I had said, or whether it was “had”, which, of course, is what I think I said, and which was in conformity with my previous observation on the matter.

But in spite of the fact that it was underlined and the note appeared in the margin “Please confirm. Thank you,” this matter was not brought to my attention and I did not, in that case, make the correction I would have made had it been brought to my attention.

I think that explains what was, I think, an unfortunate episode, but I think it also indicates that I am standing by the first answer that I gave in connection with that exchange of views.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government used the word “meetings” when he began today—at least, I think he used the word “meetings”—but it was “conversations” that the original question was about.

Senator Roblin: You may be right.

Senator MacEachen: That is what I heard, at least what I think I heard—that is, “meetings”. Presumably what the Leader of the Government intended to say today was “conversations”, and he is confirming the accuracy of the original answer of Tuesday which stated that the Prime Minister did have conversations with the President on the matter, which was the air strike against Libya.

I take it the answer to that is yes?

Senator Roblin: I think my friend is right. His question had to do with “talks”. I think that was the word he used.

Senator MacEachen: “Conversations”.

Senator Roblin: Well, I see "What did they talk about?", so I guess it is "conversations". It did not include meetings, as far as I know. So, the word "conversations" is accurate.

Senator MacEachen: To be correct, actually the word "conversations" was used by the Leader of the Government in his reply.

Senator Roblin: I am going to read the Hansard "blues" of today carefully!

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING, AS AMENDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Stanbury, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the third reading of the Bill S-2, intituled: "An Act to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons",

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the Bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

1. Strike out paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of subclause 2(2) and substitute the following:

"(a) lineally by consanguinity or adoption, or

"(b) as brother and sister by consanguinity, whether by the whole blood or by the half-blood."

2. Strike out subclauses 3(2) and (3) and substitute the following:

"(2) A marriage between persons who are related in the manner described in paragraphs 2(2)(a) or (b) is void."—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to point out to Senator Frith that this order concerns the bill to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage of related persons. When this was raised at the last sitting, I understood that Senator Frith was going to take advice from various people involved and might be in a position to tell us whether we could have third reading of this bill today.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Senator Neiman, but I am asking if I may have leave to speak to it. I have spoken to Senator Neiman, who is not able to be with us this week. She supports the bill, as amended, and, therefore, unless someone has an objection to its going forward as amended, I suggest that the question be put now—

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Yes.

Senator Frith: —and that we proceed to pass the bill and send it along the corridor to the House of Commons.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: The Honourable Senator Stanbury proposes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the bill be now read the third time.

In amendment, the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., proposes, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bélisle, that the bill be not now read the third time but that it be amended as follows:

[English]

Senator Flynn: Dispense!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: "Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production 'The Kid Who Couldn't Miss', tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake)).

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, in speaking to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology concerning the National Film Board production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," I will be brief and try not to spend too much time on material that has already been covered in the report and in the many fine speeches that have already been delivered on this subject.

However, I do have some strong feelings about the role of the National Film Board in this production and the recommendation of the committee in this regard.

But before dealing with the National Film Board, I would like to spend a few minutes on the part played by Mr. Paul Cowan, the man largely responsible for the film.

Mr. Cowan told the committee that his original intention was just to make a film about Canada's great war hero, Billy Bishop. He said his original intention was just to make a film about a young man who went to war. He claimed he had no bias about Billy Bishop one way or the other.

During his research, Mr. Cowan informed us that he came across material that cast doubts on the official and accepted version of the exploits of Billy Bishop. According to Mr. Cowan, this material he uncovered cast doubts on the number of planes Bishop claimed he had shot down and even on the raid that won him the Victoria Cross.

According to Mr. Cowan, he was then faced with the choice of dropping the film entirely, or to complete it as originally planned, or to create a new version of the Billy Bishop legend.

Mr. Cowan did not want to drop the film, and according to him, to complete it as originally planned would be dishonest, and in effect, a lie. Now Mr. Cowan presented himself to us as a very honest man, a man extremely concerned with his artistic integrity and ready to fight for his artistic freedom.

Well, honourable senators, what did this honest man do when confronted with doubts about the integrity of Billy Bishop? According to the record, he proceeded to twist the facts of Bishop's record; he rearranged the history of Bishop's exploits; he selected material to bolster his case and to smear Bishop's honesty; he left out or ignored evidence that supported Bishop's claims; and he put his own words in the mouth of Bishop's mechanic, Walter Bourne, to clinch his case against the memory of Billy Bishop. All this from the honest Mr. Cowan, a man who in my opinion stands condemned by his own words.

But enough of Mr. Cowan. I think we have already given him too much publicity, or maybe notoriety is a better word.

I would only remind him and others like him that if it were not for people like Billy Bishop he would probably enjoy very little freedom today, artistic or any other kind.

I think a much more serious case can and should be made against the role of the National Film Board in the production and distribution of this dishonest smear on the record of a great Canadian.

The National Film Board gets a great deal of its money from the Government of Canada and from the public purse. I am convinced that this gives Parliament, and that includes us, of course, a right and a responsibility to keep a critical eye on how they spend that money and how they carry out their role in our society.

Now what is, or should be, the role of the National Film Board?

Well, among other things, I presume it is to encourage Canadian artists and to present to Canadians and to the rest of the world a view of Canada that is made in Canada, and not in the United States or any other foreign country. Now I do not believe that Canadians want, or that Canadians need, the National Film Board spending their tax dollars smearing Canada's outstanding men and women.

Let me remind honourable senators that the national press of this nation does an excellent job of that with no subsidies from the government, and if they miss anything we can always rely on the CBC, another tax supported institution, to do it every night either on the national news, or that other program that they have right after the national news.

If the National Film Board gets away with this, my question is: Where will they stop?

What about other Canadians, other Canadian success stories—the Dr. Bantings, the A.Y. Jacksons, the "Rocket" Richards, or the Terry Foxes?

[Senator Steuart.]

Did A.Y. Jackson really paint all those pictures? Did "Rocket" score all those goals? Did Terry Fox really run all the way to Thunder Bay, or did he jump in the bus when we were not looking and get a ride for 200 or 300 miles? I believe that he did and they did what they set out to do. I believe that most Canadians feel the same way I do, but God help their memory and their record if the National Film Board turns another honest man like Mr. Cowan loose on them!

The question has been raised in this debate and at other times as to whether Parliament should be too critical of institutions like the National Film Board, or the CBC, or other crown corporations.

It is said over and over again that we should keep at arm's length from these organizations; some say that there should be no political interference, and that our crown corporations are almost a sacred trust.

I find this very interesting, because most organizations like the National Film Board say that they too want to keep at arm's length from the politicians and from Parliament—at arm's length. I find this extraordinary because they want to keep at arm's length—except when they come to the government for money! I suppose, honourable senators, it is impossible to keep at arm's length and get your hand in the taxpayers' pocket very deeply: it is almost impossible.

● (1440)

Honourable senators, I sincerely believe that the time is long overdue when Parliament, and that includes us, should be keeping an eye on all government-funded bodies. If they were in the private sector they would answer to their shareholders through a board of directors. I believe that Parliament should be fulfilling that function on behalf of the Canadian people.

Some people say that we are making too much of this issue. I do not agree with them. Canada is a nation of regions. It is a miracle that we have stayed united, and we have no guarantee that in the future we will continue as an undivided country. Let us make no mistake, part of the glue that holds us together is pride in our history. Again, make no mistake, it is people like Billy Bishop who helped create that history and reinforce that pride.

When the National Film Board produces a questionable film like "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," it does itself and the country a great disservice.

I do not believe the recommendation of the committee went far enough. It gave the National Film Board a gentle slap on the wrist. I firmly believe that we should have applied something with a great deal more force to some other part of their anatomy. I think that would have been much more appropriate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Steuart: I hope that later in this debate, some senator who has been more closely associated with the whole controversy will bring in an amendment to the report that will leave no doubt about the serious view the Senate of Canada takes of this matter. The actions of the National Film Board should be condemned in no uncertain terms and if we do not do it, I am afraid that no one else in this country will. I would support such an amendment, and I hope that the majority of senators on both sides of this chamber will agree with me.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Hicks, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Gigantès).

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, the other day Senator Murray, in speaking to the report of the Youth Committee, made certain remarks which, I am sorry to say, indicate that he had only skimmed the report and had not read it. Speed reading has its pitfalls. It may save time but it does terrible things to a factual appreciation of what happened. He said:

The committee does not attempt to analyze, or to do a critique of the programs directed to youth that are now in place in the federal government.

Honourable senators, at the time we were writing this report, disturbing comments were being made about these programs. We did not wish to be partisan. Some of these programs were new; they were in their first months. Sometimes it is hasty to judge these programs until we have seen some results. A document published by the Department of Employment and Immigration, which voices some of those criticisms, has reached the public.

Moreover, there were doubts then, as there are now, as to the exact size of the programs. Some shuffling in figures was being done, so in order to produce a non-partisan report, we did not want to get into that. In answering this particular point made by Senator Murray, I will restrict myself because I do not want the non-partisan character of the report, which does not criticize anything the government is doing, to be spoiled. I urge honourable senators to take what Senator Murray said in this quotation and to look into the matter. They will see that your committee was right in not delving into this.

A few more remarks should be made about this particular point. These new government programs put the emphasis on increasing employment and training opportunities through the private sector. I have two comments to make in that regard. That is a recommendation in our report. We urge that this happen and we are glad the government is taking this initiative. Another point is that there are some parts of this country where there is not much of a private sector to speak of. The most extreme example, of course, is Bell Island in Newfoundland where, out of 154 young people between the ages of 15 and 24, only two have employment. There are no employers.

There are other parts of the country where this is also true. In those instances it means that other than the private sector might have to be found to help these young people.

Further, in terms of these programs which were applied last year and which will be applied again, the government has decided to subsidize wages to encourage the private sector to hire people. It turns out that only 33 per cent of all jobs provided for young people through these government programs came from the private sector. It may be that the private sector will catch up and do more in this coming year but in the first year of the program it did not do more than 33 per cent. Had our committee delved into this, our report might have appeared to be too contentious on this issue. We were concerned about helping the young people, not getting into a political argument.

Returning to examples like Bell Island, other parts of the Maritimes and other disadvantaged areas of our country, Part III of our Constitution, compels us to fight regional disparity. This may not always be possible to do within the political time frame of about four years and by going through the private sector, so we left that aside.

There is a final issue I should like to mention which may be rectified by the government. What came to light regarding these programs Senator Murray wanted us to discuss is that although they were advertised as programs which would give young people skills, they turned out to be programs for broom pushers. We had a labelling problem. We heard of instances of this which made us a little unquiet about reporting it.

Further, when we were writing the report, we knew that Challenge '86 was about to be reduced compared to Challenge '85 and, frankly, with the problems of the young being such as they are, we felt we wanted to put the emphasis on the positive rather than highlighting the fact that government was not doing enough.

● (1450)

The second criticism made by my honourable friend, Senator Murray, was that some of the recommendations of the committee were put forward with little or no supporting arguments or documentation. Honourable senators, the transcripts of the hearings that were held, with the documentation, are available. The report has footnotes—little numbers beside certain words which are written just a little higher than the words themselves—and, at the back, there are notations that indicate where to find the document to which a particular statement has referred. That is the normal practice. We could not have dumped on senators' desks a report that included the transcripts of the entire evidence of 300 witnesses from whom we heard. This, then, is a strange and picky form of criticism, one which is not at all justified by the facts and one which could have been avoided had Senator Murray simply looked at the report, at the footnotes and at the table of references at the back. But he did not do so.

Our recommendations, with references, represent a combination of ideas put forth by the Canadians who appeared before us. We state very clearly in the report that we do not ask that any community or any level of government adopt all of the recommendations, or even many of them. We offered a series of suggestions, some of which might be more workable in one context while others would be more workable in another context. Even Keynes, when he was first writing about stimulating the economy, made a very great point about leaving such decisions to the regions. It is the people of a town or a region who know best what their resources are, what their problems are and how best to deal with them. We gave to those people a series of recommendations, backed up by studies, with indications of where such things have been tried before and how they have worked. We told all of this story in the report, with the references to be found at the end of it.

On the suggestion for a youth channel, for instance, we indicate who supports it: the CRTC supports it; the Canadian Council on Children and Youth supports it; the Salvation Army supports it, and many of the witnesses who appeared before us support it. References can be found in the bibliography.

The committee heard testimony in every city on the idea of having youth serve on various administrative boards. On native youth, we gave statistics from the Department of National Health and Welfare. We heard from ex officio members and permanent members of the committee who are, themselves, native people. We heard from officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We provided footnotes as to where this testimony can be found.

On education in Canada, we quoted copiously from the Johnson report and from people of the various universities who came to speak before us—administrators as well as professors and students. We suggested a task force for the co-ordination of educational qualifications. From page 47 to page 50 of the report, we explained the basis on which we made this recommendation. On the international "Right-to-Read" campaign, another of our recommendations, we provided the statistics that there are four million functionally illiterate Canadians. These are people who may be able to read a word painstakingly but who do not understand what it means. They cannot fill in a form with which to apply for a job. They are out of the mainstream of Canadian life. They are deprived of a chance to improve themselves because they are illiterate, and their illiteracy starts when they are young. Honourable senators, we insist that we must catch these young people while they are illiterate and make sure that they do not face the lifelong handicaps of all illiterates. We have given all of the facts in this regard.

Our recommendations on training through apprenticeship or co-operative programs include references to studies done by the OECD, by West Germany and by Austria. On the use of unemployment insurance funds or welfare funds in order to help people get a start in employment or in business, we give our references—we indicate who told us these things, where they have been tried and how successful they have been. All of this information can be found in the transcripts.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to say that the government in a briefing yesterday announced that this particular recommendation is going to be applied—although no credit was given to a Senate committee for it; perish the thought!—and that some amount of money from welfare or unemployment insurance payments will be used in the process of helping young people start a business of their own when they do not have employment.

On international youth co-operation, we gave statements and references to CIDA, CUSO and to various other sources. We heard from the Canadian Council on Children and Youth, the school counsellors' organization, the Universities of Manitoba, Lethbridge, Alberta, British Columbia, New Brunswick, Dalhousie, Prince Edward Island, the University of Quebec in Montreal, Malaspina College, Frontier College and various boards of education. We provided information and statistics about all of the problems associated with drug addiction.

Honourable senators, it would not have been necessary for Senator Murray to criticize the report in the terms in which he criticized it if he had taken the trouble to read it, but he did not do so, I regret to say. When members of this chamber, themselves, do not bother to read our reports before criticizing them, there is no wonder that sometimes people outside the house pay no attention to our reports.

The third issue is that the Senate cannot be asked credibly to endorse a report containing 26 proposals when senators have little or no idea of their individual or collective costs. The Macdonald report, which Senator Murray praises, has not costed most of its proposals. On one of its major proposals—which is, of course, on free trade with the United States—the best that the Macdonald report can come up with is a leap of faith. When the chairman of the royal commission was asked about this, he pointed out how very difficult it is to cost everything, to say which jobs would be affected, where, how and involving precisely how many people. These numbers are difficult to provide. We suggested a whole selection of programs and have done so because some people might be suitable in some situations while others would be suitable in other situations. A combination of two or three such situations might be good for one town but not for another. How the combination is to be put together is important in terms of costing the report.

There is an institution in Edmonton called the McMan group, which is made up entirely of volunteer business people. If that sort of route were to be followed, the cost would be different from that of following another route. The municipal government of Edmonton was not involved in financing this excellent group. I merely put this forward as an example of how difficult it is to cost such reports. So it is difficult to cost such reports, and what we suggested was not that they be adopted but that these particular recommendations be considered as possible sources for ideas as to what to do about our young people.

● (1500)

I come now to the fourth criticism. This really took my breath away, when I heard Senator Murray make this comment—because I know that he is a compassionate man; he is a decent man, a good man, and he cares. He said:

I think it should be pointed out that the report, and the statistics adduced by the report, show that these behavioural problems—

Among the young—that is, alcoholism, drug addiction, et cetera:

—are not of the epidemic proportions that are sometimes imagined by older people.

Well, multiple sclerosis is not of epidemic proportions, by most definitions of “epidemic”; cystic fibrosis is not of epidemic proportions; even cancer is not an epidemic, although it is a major killer. That does not mean that because the number of young people who are suffering from these problems do not represent a majority, or even a higher minority than they now represent, we need not discuss it and we cannot make recommendations because it has not yet reached epidemic proportions among the population.

Regarding alcoholism, do we want to wait until those young people who have started on the way to alcoholism have become old souses—or do we want to try to cure them while they are still young? It is an astonishing statement, that we have to wait until there are more of them suffering from these addictions before we take care of them. I was very surprised.

Referring to statistics on crime rates and suicide, Senator Murray said—again surprisingly:

As for the statistics on crime rates and suicide, I find the statistics . . . inconclusive in differentiating, in any important way, the younger generation from their elders, or in relating the incidences of crime and suicide to the economic and social conditions in the country.

At no time have we tried to relate crime and economic statistics to social conditions and economic conditions in the country.

I have been reading all these studies of the social costs of unemployment for another subcommittee on which I work, and the link cannot be made. The evidence is circumstantial. Sometimes it is difficult to say whether somebody is sick because that person is unemployed, or whether that person is unemployed because of being habitually sick. The evidence is very difficult. What comes first, the chicken or the egg? So we are very careful not to make that link; and if one reads the report, one will see that that link was not made. We were careful to watch out for it.

This is the sort of thing that one would expect from the journalists that this chamber likes to criticize for their slovenly reporting, and not from one of our distinguished members who usually is so very careful with what he says.

Further, on page 2334, Senator Murray says:

Youth unemployment is shown to decline by other forecasters.

He blames us for using the statistics of Professor Robinson. He says that in 1985 unemployment shown by Professor Robinson was 17 per cent, and we know that it was 9.8 per cent.

Well, Professor Robinson's curve in the Youth Committee report does not talk of unemployment. He talks of the percentage excess in availability of labour over demand for labour. That means that you take the official unemployed, you add to that number those that Statistics Canada says are discouraged and have stopped looking for work, and you add to those the 458,000 employable people on welfare, and you then do come up to 17 per cent, which is the gap between the available jobs and the number of people available for jobs. That is what the statistic shows. It is a significant statistic, but it is not a statistic on the official index of unemployment. A little careful reading would have avoided that mistake.

Senator Murray continues and gets back to the same theme with which he started. He said:

I draw the attention of honourable senators to the job entry program, which, although based on an experimental program carried out under the previous government, is a new program.

I mean, it is an old program but it is new. He continues:

It offers a combination of up to 52 weeks of skilled training and practical work experience.

Well, it turns out that so far the length of training that they have been given has been much less than 52 weeks. The youngsters were interviewed on a TV program, and they said, “They are asking us to push a broom, and we work six or seven weeks, and then we are out on the street again.”

How can we hope to be listened to with some respect by people outside this chamber when a report produced by one of our committees—which is open to criticism, there is no doubt about it. Every report, like every human being, has feet of clay—is criticized, after cursory reading and on the basis of errors in the reading and misreading? That, I think, is deplorable, and I regret it.

On motion of Senator David, debate adjourned.

THE BUDGET

PROPOSALS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Olson, P.C., calling the attention of the Senate to the proposals contained in the Budget Speech made by the Minister of Finance in the other place on the 26th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Olson, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Balfour would like this order to stand in his name. In fact, he may deal with it today. In any event, I know that Senator Olson would like this order to stand.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. R. James Balfour: I thank the honourable senator.

Honourable senators, I am pleased to have this opportunity to participate in the debate on the budget resolution introduced by my honourable friend, Senator Olson. The budget introduced by the Honourable Michael Wilson at the end of last February continues a strategy for economic renewal first set out by this government in November, 1984. All Canadians have benefited significantly from this strategy over the past 18 months, and I believe they will continue to benefit from the effective and constructive policies of the present government.

The budget affirms and expands the federal government's commitment to economic and fiscal responsibility, and to deficit reduction. The targets which have been set are reasonable, fair and attainable.

In May, 1985, the Minister of Finance forecast a deficit of $33.8 billion for the 1985-86 fiscal year, and that target was achieved. In this fiscal year the government has set another attainable target of $29.8 billion, and I predict that we will reach that target also.

Not only has the government halted the alarming rate of growth of the federal deficit, but it has reversed the flow and now projects smaller deficits in the future; and it has achieved this result without adversely affecting the national economy.

The strength of the economy and its vibrancy continues to fuel our economic recovery. Over the past 18 months over 580,000 new jobs have been created, 90,000 of which have been in the prairie provinces alone. The national unemployment rate is below 10 per cent for the first time in years, and unemployment rates in the prairie provinces now range from 8 per cent in Saskatchewan to 8.5 per cent in Alberta.

Inflation has held steady at around 4 per cent since the 1984 election—the most stable price environment since 1971. The Conference Board of Canada reports that consumer confidence is at near record levels. Housing starts were up 48 per cent this past December compared to December of the previous year.

Building permits in 1985 rose by 26 per cent, which represents an extra $3.7 billion in construction activity. During the last four and a half years of the previous government, total unemployment rose by more than 590,000 persons. Since the election total unemployment has fallen by 203,000 jobs. The economy of this country is turning around and this is being accomplished by striking a balance—a balance between the need for firm action to reduce the deficit and our goal to create a good climate for development.

Every Canadian has a stake in reducing the deficit and I will endeavour to state a number of reasons why. The huge cost of paying the interest on our debt leaves little room for undertaking costly new programs. How can we responsibly spend more when already a quarter of everything we spend goes toward paying interest on the debt? Second, if the deficit continues to spiral out of control, it will seriously impair the federal government's ability to maintain a wide range of important social programs. High debts mean higher interest rates. If we can reduce the deficit and therefore reduce the demand for borrowed money, interest rates for Canadians will come down. And finally, a large deficit deters investor confidence. This can put a damper on economic growth and job creation.

The small business sector, which is of significant importance to western Canadians and to the federal government, is provided with significant benefits through several tax changes. The low tax rate on active small business earnings will be reduced in stages from 15 per cent to 14 per cent effective July 1, 1987 and to 13 per cent effective July 1, 1988. The existing 12.5 per cent tax on dividend distributions by small businesses will be repealed effective January 1, 1987. The tax rules which provide deductions for allowable business investment losses incurred as a result of investments in small Canadian businesses will be extended. The lending ceiling of the Small Business Loans Act has been increased by $1.5 billion to $2.5 billion. Beginning in 1986 the $10,000 individual deduction against production revenue will be extended to those corporations taxable under Division One of the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act which do not elect to claim the $500,000 small producer credit. All of these measures will greatly enhance the financial viability of small businesses in western Canada and will encourage the entrepreneurial spirit of all Canadians.

However, honourable senators, in spite of these progressive and constructive measures contained in the February budget, it would be foolish to pretend that both western Canadian agriculture and the western Canadian energy industry are not confronted with very serious problems. In the agricultural industry, two years of severe drought coupled with falling prices for agricultural commodities have left western Canadian farmers with probably the toughest environment that they have faced since the years of the great depression. In my province of Saskatchewan, net farm income is expected to decline significantly again this year.

The budget included new measures that built on the initiatives that have already been taken to assist the farm community. It contained a farm finance package aimed at helping those farmers who need assistance through this difficult period. The policy goals in this area are clear: to strengthen the role of the Farm Credit Corporation as a more flexible farm lender, to target limited resources where they are needed most, to address cash flow and low equity problems which are two contributors to farm bankruptcies, to recognize that a farmer's ability to meet his or her credit obligations is tied to fluctuations in commodity prices, to give farmers facing insolvency the time, the opportunity, and the clout to work out fair alternatives with their creditors and to assist farmers in financial difficulty without penalizing those who are in better financial shape.

The government has committed $195 million over the next two years to address farm finance problems. This includes the cost of a $700 million commodity-based loan program to be administered through the Farm Credit Corporation. The new program will tie loan payments to fluctuations in commodity prices and it will give potentially viable farmers in low equity positions another chance. The program will carry fixed interest rates as low as 6 per cent with loan payments indexed to changes in the price of a particular farmer's commodity. There are two types of loans under the program: a full indexing option for FCC clients with 40 per cent or less equity, and a partial indexing option for FCC clients with up to 55 per cent or less equity.

Here is how the program is intended to work. Assume a farm family produces wheat and beef. They choose to have their loan indexed to the price of their two major commodities. If they qualify for a fully indexed loan, their interest rate is fixed at 6 per cent for a ten-year term. The payments on the loan will rise or fall by the same percentage as the rise or fall in wheat and beef prices. In other words, if the family earns less they pay less. If they earn more they pay more. If they qualify instead for the partial indexing option, their interest rate is 6 per cent plus the difference between this rate and the going ten-year rate on FCC loans. Today that interest rate would work out to 9.18 per cent. Meanwhile, their loan payments would rise or fall by half of the percentage change in wheat and beef prices. Again, the less they earn, the less they pay.

We feel this program fulfills a number of our farm financing objectives. It is well targeted. It offers hope to farmers in low equity positions, and it deals directly with the cashflow problems caused by changing commodity prices. Other budget measures include additional capital financing for the Farm Credit Corporation. The result is that the corporation will not have to borrow as much in order to meet the demand for loans. Accordingly, the Farm Credit Corporation will have the flexibility necessary to hold interest rates at the lowest level possible.

The basic objective of this government's farm financing package is to create an environment in which Canada's farmers can remain in business. However, regrettable as it is, the fact is that some farmers are simply unable to do so. Therefore, a program is being developed by the Minister of Agriculture, in co-operation with his colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration, to be known as the Canadian Rural Transition Program. The decision to leave farming, or indeed to make any career change, necessitated by economic conditions, is always a painful one. This program will be designed to make it somewhat easier. It will provide the counselling, retraining and financial assistance needed to ease such producers into a new way of life. Until such time as this new program is in place, the moratorium announced last September on Farm Credit Corporation foreclosure actions remains in effect.

Another program under development intended to assist farmers in economic difficulties is the proposal to create farm debt review panels. This program will give farmers facing insolvency a stay of proceedings. During this time they will be fully protected against action by their creditors. Farmers will then have the option of going to an impartial panel with producer representation in order to attempt to work out alternative arrangements with their creditors. Mutually agreeable solutions will be filed with the courts and become legally binding. A similar program is operating at the present time in my home province of Saskatchewan and I understand it is working well. It is our hope the federal program can and will give farmers across Canada who might otherwise face foreclosure the means to negotiate alternatives.

The farm financing package contained in the budget clearly demonstrates the high priority the present government places on Canadian agriculture. No other single sector claimed this kind of attention, this degree of special assistance. Indeed, this government's record on agriculture takes a back seat to no one. The government has acted to provide a $500,000 capital gains tax exemption on the sale of farm property. It has provided an $80 million interest rate conversion program, lower Farm Credit Corporation interest rates, and a shared-risk mortgage program in addition to the new initiatives included in the present budget. It promised amendments to the Western Grain Stabilization Act to trigger payments in time for spring seeding. It delivered to the tune of $522 million last year, most of it in the spring, and added to that $150 million in special drought assistance on the prairies and more than $700 million in crop insurance payments. It promised and provided dual labelling in metric and imperial for all farm chemicals. The list goes on.

Canada's farmers are facing difficult times. The government has responded with unprecedented action with more than 180 agricultural initiatives worth more than $3.8 billion.

• (1520)

In the energy sector, the federal cabinet has under active consideration for early implementation measures intended to provide relief to hard-pressed Canadian producers whose cash flows are being devastated by the free fall in international oil prices. In addition, consultations are being held at the federal-provincial government level in both Alberta and Saskatchewan, since provincial governments have a clear responsibility in this area, particularly in view of the prevailing high royalty rates levied by provincial governments against producers.

Early action is clearly called for, but I hope and trust that the action, when taken, will have been clearly and coherently thought through in order to avoid the "ad hockery" which was the hallmark of energy policy under the previous government during the era of rapidly-rising international oil prices of the 1970s.

When this government was elected in September 1984, it promised to restore the country to financial health, to release the creative spirit of individuals from the heavy hand of government, and to assist Canadians to adjust to a changing world. Honourable senators, that is what was promised and I submit that is what is being delivered.

On motion of Senator Frith, for Senator Olson, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, and the document entitled: "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe this order has been dealt with under a different heading. I think a budget was brought in and approved so I think that this order at this point is redundant and could probably be considered debated.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it is invalid to roll the subject matter of this order into the motion of Senator Tremblay that he has intimated will be taken into consideration tomorrow under "Reports of Committees".

Senator Doody: Senator Marshall agrees that this matter should be considered debated.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I wonder if that is right. It seems to me that the problem is that it is a motion and cannot simply be considered debated. It would need to be withdrawn, but I am not sure that what Senator Tremblay is doing is complying with the new rules whereby if the committee is asking for extra powers that involve the expenditure of money, then he must discuss the cost and the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. Perhaps, honourable senators, we had better leave this item on the order paper until we have had an opportunity to look at it again. Perhaps we could have it stand until then.

Order stands.

INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to examine, consider and make recommendations on the problems and issues of current and likely future terrorist activity in Canada, directed at Canadians or using Canada as a base for extra-Canadian activities;

That the Committee make specific recommendations on the Government of Canada's policies with respect to terrorism; the protection of Canadians and Canadian federal and provincial government representatives abroad; the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents; the ability of conventional law enforcement organizations in Canada to deal with specific terrorist incidents; and the need for an anti-terrorist organization in Canada, its role and reporting relationship;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, act as members of the Special Committee;

That the Committee have power to report from time to time, to send for persons, papers and records, and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee have power to adjourn from place to place within Canada;

That the Committee have power to retain the services of professional, clerical and stenographic staff as deemed advisable by the Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than October 1, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I ask leave, pursuant to rule 23, to withdraw this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the only problem that I can see is that this matter was adjourned in Senator Sinclair's name and since he is not here, I suppose it is technically a matter of les absents ont toujours tort. I suppose that Senator Kelly can tell us whether it is all right with Senator Sinclair.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I am afraid I neglected to mention that the matter was discussed with Senator Sinclair and he has no objection.

Motion withdrawn.

THE SENATE

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE BROADCASTING OF PROCEEDINGS— MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Davey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith:

That the Senate authorize arrangements for radio and television broadcasting of its proceedings and those of its committees,

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody, that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.—(Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax)).

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, before I make a few brief remarks in response to the motion of Senator Davey which is, I think, now almost a year old, I would like to draw the attention of the chamber, for those who are interested in this subject, to a recently published piece of research by the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. It is dated April 15 last and is by Mr. Wolfgang Koerner. It is a very interesting piece of work, obviously commissioned by the Speaker of the House of Commons. It deals with the media, politics, the House of Commons, the effects of television, the ideological factor and structure of debates, recent developments and then there is a conclusion. I think you will find it very interesting.

I also draw your attention to a recent article in the Vancouver Sun reporting the remarks of the Speaker of the House of Commons, the Honourable John Bosley. It begins:

Televising proceedings of the House of Commons has contributed to a growing decline in respect for Parliament, House Speaker John Bosley said Friday.

It continues:

Statistics suggest there is a correlation between the introduction of television into the Commons and the decline in respect.

There is then a direct quote from Mr. Bosley:

'While this electronic medium has been a triumph in exposure, it has also been a failure in education. Television has acted as a selective editing process that has not done justice to the responsibilities of members of Parliament.'

The McGrath report on parliamentary reform said:

The evidence of the past eight years suggests that television has caused only a few changes. For example, members now applaud instead of thumping their desks to signify approval. Members also tend to move around the chamber to sit behind the desk of the person speaking. Attempts to counter the impression that members are talking to an empty house are not really successful. No one is really fooled. The game of musical chairs simply adds an artificial element that would be unnecessary if there were greater public understanding of the reasons why members were not always in their seats in the House of Commons.

Honourable colleagues, I suggest that if they have that problem in the other place, it is entirely possible that we might have at least an equal problem here, and one that will not be solved by bringing in television cameras. I wonder whether the presence of a television camera would eliminate the criticisms we sometimes receive for our frequent adjournments when Parliament is in session; for the slim attendance of some of our members in this chamber, or for our apparent lack of initiative in attacking public problems, and so on. I realize that some of these criticisms are either unfair or they are understandable or they are incontestable. Some are said to be of our own making. Some people say that, given the will, the Senate could go a long way to reforming itself. Be that as it may, I remain to be convinced that the advent of television in this chamber will be of any real assistance in this regard. In other words, I really cannot see how television coverage, per se, to quote Senator Davey, will make us better parliamentarians.

As I understand it, the legislative procedures have been improved a great deal since the 1920s, but according to a number of my peers it is doubtful that much more can be done in this direction as we are presently constituted. Therefore I really find it difficult to understand how a useful public educational purpose will be served by the television coverage of the proceedings of this chamber. I have, however, different views with respect to the television coverage of some of our committees.

I quote also the view of Mr. Jack Ellis, the Member of Parliament for Prince Edward-Hastings who, when speaking on parliamentary reform, said:

What we have been discussing, with all due respect, has not been an electronic Hansard, but merely changing the rules sufficiently in the House of Commons to allow television to come in at committees.

● (1530)

As honourable senators may know, we have already made a modest start in that direction. I refer to the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce some months ago when there was great interest focused on the failure of the two banks. The witness on that particular occasion was the Honourable Barbara McDougall. Her testimony created, of course, a great deal of public interest. Permission was asked of the Senate to allow television cameras to record the meeting. Permission was granted, and the meeting was held in Room 250 of the East Block, which is ideally suited for television coverage in that no obtrusive lighting is required; the lighting in the room is quite sufficient. The equipment was hidden behind the translation booth, and there were two fixed cameras, which caused no particular problems. All of the requirements that were set out by the chairman of the committee, Senator Murray, were met, and that stands out as an example of how easy it is to televise a committee meeting on certain occasions—that is, when there is public interest in a matter and sufficient notice is given.

I think we behaved rather well. Our worst fears were not realized. I think we are all quite pleased at the way it turned out.

It is also important to note, honourable senators, that this was done without any cost to the public. The television people will continue to make the determination as to what they feel the public wants to see or where the public interest is. Those same television people have a responsibility of maintaining their public licence and of reflecting this interest with their own facilities and at their own expense.

What is interesting to note is that that particular example—the coverage of that particular meeting—is now being studied as a model by the internal economy committee of the House of Commons. It is being used as a guide to help them decide how to go about the television coverage of committee meetings. Surely this lends additional support to the amendment of Senator Phillips that this matter, similarly, should be referred to the Internal Economy Committee of this place.

We should not discourage coverage of our committee meetings. It is—as is commonly accepted—the Senate performing at its best.

In my short time here I have been most impressed by the collective experience of the members of this chamber working in committee. There are better expressions of individual opinion. For obvious reasons, there is no need for posturing and relatively little party complexion. Certainly there is not the same degree of partisanship which marks speeches in the House of Commons.

I do not want to be too gloomy on matters which I should, by tradition and background, be supporting, but I draw honourable senators' attention to a speech delivered by Peter O'Malley, one of the advocates years ago of the televising of the proceedings of the House of Commons. He was a former assistant to the leader of the New Democratic Party, and he delivered this speech to the Department of Political Science at Guelph University. He calls it "The Trivialization of Parliament: Television and the Canadian House of Commons," and he says, with great disappointment, the following:

—what is the end result of bringing television into the Commons?

In my view, the result is that night after sorry night, a nation of viewers is exposed to a portrayal of Parliament the dominant characteristic of which is perpetual, and often incoherent, partisan conflict. Consequently, and especially over time, the institution—and those in it—become simply wearisome, and their handling of issues, no matter how important the issue, appears trivial at best and counter-productive at worst.

Unquestionably, honourable senators, the time will come in an age requiring further information when all the proceedings of both houses will be available on a special channel. It is only a matter of time. In the United States they have what is called the "C-Span" network, which now provides full coverage—gavel-to-gavel coverage—of all legislative proceedings in Washington. That is some distance away. I simply suggest that we could make a start, and I suggest that one way is to take a look at the requests we will receive for the coverage of Senate committee meetings.

Indeed, Senator Davey said that. He said:

I rather deliberately included in my motion reference to Senate committees, because so often that is where the Senate is at its very best.

But then he added, and I suppose that this is relevant to this discussion, the following:

The cost would, of course, be substantial. It cost approximately $5 million to establish television in the House of Commons and about $1 million per year thereafter to operate. For the Senate the cost would likely be about half as much to establish, but it would cost about the same amount annually to operate. I would like to stress to honourable senators at this time that these are ballpark figures.

Well, they are ballpark figures. The Globe and Mail reports that the televising of proceedings of the Ontario Legislature will cost more than three times the original estimate, according to the consultants' report. I do not have the date of that particular article, but at that particular time the cost was estimated to be somewhere around $7.3 million.

Proceedings of the House of Commons were first televised on—and this will, of course, bring back memories to the honourable the Leader of the Opposition, Senator Allan J. MacEachen—October 17, 1977. The virtue of televising the proceedings of that House had been discussed off and on for 15 years, and, more importantly, had been the subject of three investigations. Honourable senators, I am not suggesting to you that we should devote that amount of time to this motion, but I am suggesting, with respect, that the motion deserves most serious consideration to determine, if implemented, whether it will really live up to the legislative expectations of Senator Davey, Senator Croll and others who share that view. Similarly, there are others in the Senate who have legitimate doubts. One cannot blindly accept the principle of this motion. I simply urge honourable senators to support the motion in amendment proposed by Senator Phillips, which reads:

—that the motion be not now adopted, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator Robertson, debate adjourned.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport".—(Honourable Senator Bosa).

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I should like to seek unanimous consent, now that Senator Bosa is in the chamber, to revert to Order No. 2, as I believe Senator Bosa would like to make a short remark.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, I do not intend to speak on this, but I believe that Senator Haidasz intimated that if I were not going to speak on the order he would like to refer this bill to the appropriate committee. I am prepared to consent to that.

● (1540)

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I would like to thank Senator Bosa for allowing me to make a few remarks at the present time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Haidasz speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for the second reading of this bill.

Senator Haidasz: Since this item has been on the order paper since February 19, and no one has spoken to it at this time, I believe that it is right that I make a few remarks in the hope that we will get second reading of Bill S-8.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: But if you speak now, your speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the matter.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On second reading.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Are you speaking, in any case?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have no wish to interfere with Senator Haidasz's motion, but there are some people on this side who have expressed a desire to speak. I will raise the question in our caucus this afternoon. If I may take the adjournment now, I will refer to the matter again tomorrow.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it a motion to adjourn the debate?

Senator Frith: In Senator Doody's name, yes.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

UNITED STATES AIR STRIKE—CONSULTATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES AND BETWEEN CANADA AND WESTERN ALLIES—FURTHER CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT IN OFFICIAL RECORD

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, before we deal with Presentation of Petitions, I should like to draw attention to the fact that yesterday an exchange took place between me and the Leader of the Opposition about the accuracy of the original answer of Tuesday, April 15. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am confirming the accuracy of all of the answers that I gave on that particular Tuesday, and not one in particular.

Hon. Hazen Argue: That is one of your better answers—very expansive.

Senator Roblin: I aim to oblige.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

EIGHTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the Eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, which reads as follows:

Wednesday, April 30, 1986

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

On March 18, 1986, the Senate referred, for consideration and report, the following motion:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate Committees”

Your Committee met on April 24, 1986 to consider the matter.

Your committee reports that the motion is appropriate.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

Honourable senators, as I believe was the intention of the Senate, the request to the Rules Committee was not that it should discuss the substance of the motion—that is, whether or not smoking should be allowed in committees—but, rather, whether this was the type of rule which would permit that decision by the Senate.

It was the view of the committee that only the Senate could, in the final analysis, make the decision as to whether or not it wanted to ban smoking. The report merely states that it would be in order to pass such a rule and that it would be in that form.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, on a point of order, the proceedings on March 18, 1986, when the reference was made to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, provided:

That the motion be not now adopted, but that it be referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for consideration and report.

As a result of that, it is not at the moment on the order paper.

We have two choices. I can move the motion again, which seems to me to be a silly way to do it, or I can ask for leave to have the motion reappear on the order paper, so that we can continue to discuss it in conjunction with this report. I therefore ask that it so reappear.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL FISCAL ARRANGEMENTS

NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY
SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-96

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance be authorized to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-96, intituled: “An Act to amend the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post-Secondary Education and Health Contributions Act, 1977”, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF UNITED STATES—ACID RAIN—STATUS OF AGREEMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Perhaps he will make a note, because I do not want to read all this material into the record.

On March 20, 1986 there was an exchange between Senator MacEachen and Senator Roblin on the subject of acid rain and on the implementation of the understanding that was said to have been reached between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States during the so-called second Shamrock Summit.

Recently, at a Congressional hearing the Energy Secretary of the United States, John Herrington, apparently raised doubts about whether the report's major recommendation—that is, the $5 billion program that was discussed in the proceedings to which I have referred—would ever materialize in full. Apparently, he said before that committee that the administration has no budget proposals for spending the proposed $5 billion—of course, as the Leader of the Government pointed out, quite correctly, during the exchange, though Congress is required to approve the budget, the President must present it—in co-operation with industry as the envoys suggested. There is a reported statement that a Democrat, Henry Waxman, whose proposed acid rain bill was the focus of the hearing to which I have just referred, apparently said before the committee, "We really fooled those Canadians."

Senator Doody: Now you know why Newfoundlanders are sensitive!

Senator Frith: Will the Leader of the Government inquire of the appropriate minister—who, I assume, would be the Minister of the Environment—whether he will look into those observations and the evidence that was given before that Congressional committee and bring us some news as to whether we should take those observations seriously and as to whether the whole Shamrock Summit acid rain proposal is really that dead?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall.

[Senator Doody.]

AGRICULTURE

WHEAT—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—EFFECT OF PRICE INCREASE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate, which arises out of the Prime Minister's important announcement affecting certain agricultural policies. First, I might say that I welcome the proposed reduction in the levy on fuels for farmers. However, I want to make particular reference to the announcement that commencing August 1 the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to raise the price level for domestic wheat going to the flour milling industry to $11 per bushel.

My question is this: Does this proposition in any way limit or affect the ability and the responsibility of the committee of the House of Commons that is touring Canada to recommend a two-price wheat system in excess of the suggested $11 ceiling?

I point out to the Leader of the Government that the announced drop in the initial price for wheat as of August 1 for the high-milling grades is approximately 80 cents per bushel. I also point out that this proposal, if in fact it does come into effect on August 1, would mean, by my calculations, an increase in the price to the millers of seven or eight cents per bushel. I think this represents a very small part of the major reduction in the initial price that has taken place. I would therefore like to know just what effect this has on the inquiry that I believe is now under way.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): It does not limit the ability of the committee to make their recommendations.

Senator Argue: I am certainly glad to hear that, because in my judgment, while this is a welcome announcement in that the price is increased, it is a very inadequate increase, perhaps 20 or 25 cents a bushel compared to the 80-cent drop. For what it is worth, I would suggest to the government leader and, I would hope through Debates of the Senate to the task force, that they should consider increases in the price of wheat in the range of up to $20 per bushel. I know that there will be those who say that the consumers would have to pay too much, but this is a crisis in a very important industry. The cost of food in Canada in relation to the consumer's budget is approximately 16 per cent, down from some 22 per cent a few years ago. My calculation is that, if the flour-milling industry and the bread-baking industry were not allowed to gouge the consumer, then my suggestion would amount to an increase of some 25 cents on a loaf of bread. I would think that that is a rather legitimate request to the consumers of Canada at this time on behalf of the grain industry.

Senator Roblin: I invite my honourable friend to appear before the committee and make his case. It sounds like an interesting one.

Senator Argue: Perhaps we should go together.

Senator Roblin: The problem is that I like the Americans and you do not.

Senator Argue: I do not like what the Americans are doing to us through their farm policy.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CANADIAN USE OF LOBBYIST—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Keith Davey: Honourable senators, on April 17 I asked the Leader of the Government a series of questions with respect to the lobbying in Washington of Michael K. Deaver on behalf of the Government of Canada. Many of the questions I asked, on which the government leader took an order for return, are now matters of public record. The Government of Canada's contract for one year expires on June 30, 1986. The government paid Mr. Deaver $100,000 salary plus $5,000 expenses.

According to Dalton Camp:

—the Prime Minister's chief policy adviser, Fred Doucet, originally proposed that Deaver represent Canada's interests in Washington.

Also, honourable senators, at that time I asked a supplementary question about why the United States Office of Government Ethics was investigating Mr. Deaver's activities on behalf of the Government of Canada. The government leader was not very forthcoming, and suggested I would have to ask the American authorities. However, Mr. Deaver's activities on behalf of Canada have now become an international cause célèbre and I am sure the government leader will agree with his friend Dalton Camp who wrote in the Toronto Star yesterday about Mr. Deaver:

—as a client, we

—that is, Canadians—

can be allowed to have an interest.

In that spirit, I wonder if I could ask the government leader why the Government of Canada, and specifically Ambassador Gottlieb, is refusing Canadian co-operation in connection with the several inquiries which have now begun.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): This is rather a pleasant occasion when I find my honourable friend quoting Mr. Dalton Camp with apparent approbation. I think I will have a copy of Debates of the Senate sent to Mr. Camp to make sure he knows he has more than one friend in this chamber.

In answer to the question, may I say that the Government of Canada is co-operating with the inquiry into Mr. Deaver's activities in the United States by providing the authorities there with information respecting our relationship with Mr. Deaver, his contract and cognate matters. Therefore, we are not at all loath to give them the information that we feel might be of use to them.

With respect to the Government of Canada's appearing before a United States inquiry committee, which is what my honourable friends thinks we ought to do, I have to say that it has not been the custom of most sovereign nations to accept this kind of policy for their nationals and for their activities, any more than we would expect to summon any member of the American administration to appear before an inquiry in Canada into a matter of this sort.

• (1410)

So, I think it is a question of Canada's adhering to established international procedure. It has certainly been the policy of Canadian governments throughout the years not to accept invitations of the kind my honourable friend has extended.

Senator Frith: It cost us $100,000 to be fooled.

Senator Davey: I am grateful for that answer from the Leader of the Government. He may wish to get in touch with Newsweek magazine, the current issue of which says that the Canadian government is refusing to co-operate with the investigation. Of course, I take the word of the Leader of the Government in the Senate rather than that of Newsweek magazine.

My supplementary question is: The basic problem is that the American Ethics In Government Act of 1978 forbids former government officials from seeking to influence their former departments or agencies on behalf of private clients for a year. It forbids a former official from lobbying for two years on issues that that official participated in personally and substantially while in government.

I accept the leader's position that it would be unusual for us to appear before the committee, but I would suggest—

Senator Flynn: You can go yourself!

Senator Davey:—it is unusual for us to retain a lobbyist in the first place. In any event, it is very clear that Mr. Deaver's activity on behalf of Canada began just weeks after he left the White House. I am wondering if the Leader of the Government would agree that this whole tacky affair makes us look like a banana republic or the receiver of stolen goods. Is this the image that Canada wants to portray to the United States and to the rest of the world?

Senator Frith: We were easily fooled!

Senator Roblin: My honourable friend knows that Mr. Deaver himself has requested an investigation of his affairs by the appropriate authorities in the United States. I am not willing to hang him here by proxy or in absentia, and I certainly do not think that we would be well advised to take that attitude in respect of the matter. Until all the facts are clear, I think my friend should reserve his judgment.

Senator Flynn: He can appear before the committee. He knows all about it.

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY INCENTIVES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, my question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate arises out of the Prime Minister's press conference of today in which he announced some very welcome news for the energy sector. I think we are all pleased to see that the Government of Canada is now going to increase the exemption from the PGRT enjoyed by oil companies from $500,000 per year to $2 million per year effective May 1, and, in addition, that there will be zero PGRT on production from Syncrude and Suncor as of May 1. That news is very welcome in western Canada.

My question is along the line of exchanges we have heard between the Leader of the Government and Senator Olson. We have been told that when there is a change in policy an announcement will be made. I am wondering whether this is a change in policy and in the bottom line. The energy sector is very stressed and has been asking for some special incentives, in particular incentive pricing on a minimum amount of production for each company.

Can we expect more announcements, or is this an indication, as was suggested in yesterday's Globe and Mail, that this is the policy of the government? And is the policy that there will be no change?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I accept the rather back-handed compliment offered by my honourable friend and note that he approves of what we have done so far. It is quite possible that this may not be the last statement. I certainly have nothing to say about it today. This is our policy at this moment. As my honourable friend knows, as circumstances change and time develops, there may be other changes, but I am not holding out to him any undertakings with respect to the matter one way or the other.

Senator Hays: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Again prompted by an article in this morning's paper to the effect that oil analysts F. H. Deacon Hodgson Incorporated indicate that it is their opinion that oil revenues could fall by as much as $10 billion in 1986 over 1985—going back to a time immediately prior to the last election and the talk of the energy sector being an engine of growth creating, as I recall, some 30,000 jobs for every billion dollars it was spending—has the government taken any position on whether it can be an engine of contraction to the same degree?

Senator Roblin: Well, I must say my honourable friend had to work hard for that one, so I will give him credit for it. I can say to him, however, that we did our part with respect to our election promises by removing the National Energy Policy which, at the same time, removed tens, maybe hundreds of millions of dollars of taxes from the oil industry. At that time my honourable friend, I think was—certainly some of his colleagues were—slating us very severely, indeed, for having made that move. I myself am glad that we did because it has made the problem somewhat less grave than it would otherwise have been.

No one pretends that the oil industry is in good shape. It is in a very trying and difficult position and will require the best efforts of all concerned, starting with the industry itself—and I know that I can say with confidence that they will respond in as constructive a manner as they can—and also the best efforts of the two governments concerned.

[Senator Hays.]

In view of the position of the Government of Canada, I think that the move that my friend refers to is a good move, and I am glad that we made it.

THE CABINET

CONFLICT OF INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the concern of Canadians about self-dealing and conflicts of interest, could he inform this chamber whether the conflict-of-interest attitude of the government extends throughout a household?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I know that my own wife considers herself to be a free-standing, independent person.

Senator Steuart: Do you stay at arm's length from her at all times?

Senator Frith: Only through a "blind trust"!

Senator Sinclair: In view of the answer of the government leader that wives are "independent" and "free standing"—and he having a lot of experience in this area—I wonder if he feels that it is a normal situation for somebody to borrow something in excess of $2.5 million on his assets without telling him?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend is talking about wives, I presume he means wives and husbands—in other words, spouses. So, it works both ways. I think I would rather answer Senator Steuart's question than my honourable friend's.

Senator Steuart: Go ahead. I do not want a national explanation.

Senator Flynn: Do you want to get into the debate?

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I think when somebody borrows $2.5 million on assets they should tell people about it. It seems to me that it is quite a leap of faith to accept the situation that somebody would borrow $2.5 million on somebody else's assets without telling them. I was asking the government leader if he would consider that a leap of faith.

Senator Roblin: As far as I am concerned, the question is hypothetical.

Senator Sinclair: Well, let's make it factual, then. Let us assume that the story in the Globe and Mail is accurate. I am sure that the Globe and Mail—having a great reputation for accuracy, a reputation that has been outstanding for so long—would not publish anything without careful investigation. The article in the Globe and Mail states that the "cash-starved York Centre Corp.," which is owned by Mr. Stevens, had, as one of its subsidiaries, a real estate arm. That real estate arm borrowed $2.5 million on favourable terms after having dealt with somebody who had had access to public largesse.

In light of that circumstance—and I would ask the Leader of the Government to accept this article in the Globe and Mail as a factual story—would he believe that the borrowing of that $2.5 million on someone else's assets should be brought to the attention of the person who owns them?

● (1420)

Senator Roblin: As far as I am concerned, I find the question to be hypothetical.

With respect to the particular incident my friend speaks of, it has been answered, I think, completely by the Prime Minister in the other place. I have nothing to add to what he said.

Senator Sinclair: I have in my hand, honourable senators, a letter from the Prime Minister dated September 9, 1985 addressed to the Right Honourable John N. Turner which, in part, states:

As I believe it is imperative in a democracy that public office holders have the trust and confidence of the people they serve,—

That was the basis of the action taken.

My question is: Would this kind of deal, which was reported in the Globe and Mail and to which I have referred, result in confidence and trust on the part of the people of Canada?

Senator Roblin: What is the question?

Senator Sinclair: That is the question. Is it the opinion of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that it is government policy that that kind of action is in accordance with bringing about the trust and confidence of the people office holders serve?

Senator Roblin: My friend knows that I do not give opinions here.

Senator Flynn: Silly.

Senator Frith: It is not silly at all. The answer is silly.

NUCLEAR DISASTER

UKRAINE—EFFECTS OF RADIATION—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE AND ACTION

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, yesterday the Leader of the Government undertook to try to get information that would bring us up to date on knowledge the government may have and action the government may be taking regarding the leak of the nuclear reactor in the Soviet Union. Can he report to us today?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): There is really no new information available to us apart from that I gave yesterday. We have been seeking it but it has not been made available.

I can deal a little further with a question raised between my honourable friend and myself yesterday about monitoring in the Arctic. I can tell her that that is taking place. All the weather stations up there are monitoring this particular situation to make sure that there is no adverse fallout in the air over Canada.

While it is probably too soon to get any positive information because of the time taken for this material to disperse over the world, we are monitoring it very carefully.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

SAFETY OF CANADIAN REACTORS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that there are 100 nuclear reactors in the U.S.A., not far from us, and 28 under construction, and 18 in Canada and one under construction, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us whether the government intends to undertake a cost effectiveness and safety analysis, at least of the Canadian nuclear reactors, to make sure that they are foolproof from explosions?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think we already do everything we can in this respect.

NUCLEAR DISASTER

UKRAINE—SAFETY AND HEALTH OF CANADIAN NATIONALS—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, respecting the nuclear disaster in the Soviet Union, it was reported today that the Government of Finland has instructed Finnish citizens located in the affected areas near Kiev in Ukraine to be evacuated immediately in order to avoid harmful effects of radiation on their health. Reports of similar actions taken by other European countries have appeared in the media today.

Yesterday, Senator Roblin, in his response to Senator Fairbairn's question, said that the 18 Canadians in that area were safe and well and Mr. Clark, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, stated that Canada has not advised Canadians to leave.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate explain why the Canadian government has refused to act to help those Canadians in the affected areas whose health could very well be jeopardized and in great danger?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Of course, the premise of my honourable friend's question is completely false. Who said that the Canadian government is unwilling to act to help our people if they need help? Of course, that is not the case. We are willing to help them should help be required.

Senator Grafstein: Honourable senators, it has been reported that Mr. Clark has said that he is taking no action to evacuate or advise those citizens, whose health may be in jeopardy and who may not be informed of the circumstances in the Soviet Union, of the status of their health, whereas Finland, an adjacent nation, has withdrawn or evacuated its citizens.

Senator Roblin: My friend knows that there are 18 Canadians in the area of Kiev, where this disaster has taken place. He also knows that our representatives in Moscow have been in touch with those people and that they are in good shape.

Senator Grafstein: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate then tell us whether the Government of Canada has sought to obtain from the Soviet Union—either in concert with other nations such as Sweden, which has made these requests, or multilaterally through the International Commission on Atomic Energy in Austria or through the United Nations—the full and complete disclosure of the consequences of this disaster, which appear to be growing, in order to safeguard the health of the persons beyond the borders of the Soviet Union who may be affected by this disaster?

Senator Roblin: Where does my friend want me to stop? I mean to say that we can start with Poland, we can move through eastern Europe, perhaps to western France; where does he want me to stop? We are trying to find out from the Government of the Soviet Union as much as it will tell us about this disaster to see whether there are any further steps we need to take. We have offered help if there should be a request for help. We will do what we can in all respects, not only to concern ourselves with the safety of people outside the Soviet Union but also to concern ourselves with the safety of people inside the Soviet Union. We are going to do everything we can to be useful in this disaster, should we be requested to do so.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I thought the question was—Senator Flynn: Yes; you explain it to us.

Senator Frith: In view of the fact that the Swedes and the Finns have apparently suggested that their people leave, and are taking steps to evacuate them, I thought the question was: Is the government going to ask them what information they might have that led them to that conclusion? That is all; the Leader of the Government is not being asked to ask everybody.

Senator Roblin: The answer is that we will get the information from any source we can.

Senator Frith: Good.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

SAFETY OF CANADIAN REACTORS

Hon. Robert Muir: Honourable senators, I have a question supplementary to that which was posed by Senator Haidasz. The nuclear reactors to which Senator Haidasz referred—can he correct me if I am wrong—were constructed under the previous administration, were they not? Would they not have had safeguards in place? Can I have the assurance from the Leader of the Government that those safeguards are still in place, if, in fact, they have not been improved upon?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think I can return an affirmative answer to my friend's question.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—FISHERIES—IMPOSITION OF U.S. TARIFF—CANADIAN GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which arises from statements made yesterday by the Minister for International Trade and the Minister of Fisheries. In response to questions in the other place which arose due to the imposition of a new tariff against whole fish from Canada, the answers implied that the Government of Canada was grateful that duties had not been imposed on all fish products from Canada. Does that indicate that the present government is prepared to accept a situation where duties are imposed on all fish products from Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Of course, the answer to that question is no. If my honourable friend had read all of the material on this subject, he would know that consideration has been given to appealing the present decision to GATT to see whether it comes within the terms of reference of that body.

Senator Thériault: It is true that that was part of the answer. But the part of the answer I am worried about—and I am sure the fishermen are worried about—is that dealing with attitude. The government seems to be saying, "Thank you for not imposing duty on the rest of the fish products." If that is the kind of attitude that Canada is carrying into the trade discussions with the U.S., then God help Canadians!

Senator Roblin: That is my honourable friend's interpretation of government policy, but it could not be further from the facts. The fact is that we are deeply concerned about the protectionist activities in the United States today on many fronts, and not just on the front concerning fish. The whole thrust of our trade policy is to do something to shield our country from the protectionist tendencies that exist right now. That is what we are concerned about. We are going to find that those protectionist forces in the United States will continue to be active. It will take all that we can do to shield our economy from them. That is one of the main thrusts of our trade negotiations with that country.

• (1430)

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it seems strange to me—since the Prime Minister has announced his determination to follow through on free trade negotiations with the Americans—that monthly, and sometimes weekly, we hear of countervailing tariffs being imposed by the Americans. Is that just a coincidence, or are the Americans telling us, "You are going to do what we want you to do, or else!"?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think my honourable friend's interpretation is completely wrong. Many of those issues have been in the mill for many a long year, as he well knows. He also knows, or he ought to know, that we have had the same problem with some American imports into Canada. So those things are mutual aggravations in the realm of trade. The honourable senator can be assured that it is our policy to save the country as far as we can from protectionist influences in the United States, which did not start yesterday.

Senator Thériault: It is getting worse.

THE CABINET

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POLICY—SENATOR'S ARM'S LENGTH RELATIONSHIP

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, to pass from the piscatorially deplorable and the nuclearly unthinkable, to the uxoriously unutterable, would the Leader of the Government oblige me—and this is the question—by telling the minister in the other place that I too have similar problems with my spouse? Whenever we go to a restaurant, and she wants to find out how much we have paid, I keep her at arm's length and will not tell her.

Senator Flynn: How cute! You are very funny.

NUCLEAR DISASTER

UKRAINE—EFFECTS OF RADIATION—GOVERNMENT KNOWLEDGE AND ACTION

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a couple of supplementary questions, but everyone else seemed so anxious to ask their questions that I let them go ahead and I have left mine until the last. With regard to the nuclear accident in Ukraine, my concern is for Canadians. What are we doing in Canada to monitor radiation in the air in the northern regions of Canada and to protect Canadians in the north?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Environment Canada is monitoring the situation with respect to the possibility of fall-out from this disaster, as I have announced three times in this house. I am glad to tell my friend again that we are doing that. There are 28 posts all over the country at which that monitoring takes place, and if anything is detected that is worthy of report, we will all be notified.

Senator Bonnell: Do I take it from that answer that nothing took place worthy of report?

Senator Roblin: That is a logical deduction, and my friend is nothing if not logical.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday, a professor of physics at the University of Toronto said that the most comprehensive and best method of monitoring nuclear radiation is done by Sweden. I would ask the Leader of the Government whether it is the intention of the government to upgrade Canada's monitoring system.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I am afraid that I cannot really pass judgment on an expression of opinion by the professor or scientist of whom my honourable friend speaks; so there is no way that I can answer the question.

THE CABINET

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I have a further supplementary question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday, in the House of Commons, the Honourable Erik Nielsen repeatedly insisted that the guidelines do not apply to spouses of MPs, who should be free to pursue independent careers.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Argue: Let's hope so!

Senator Bonnell: I agree with the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister that many of them are better businessmen, or, I should say, businesswomen—

An Hon. Senator: Business persons.

Senator Bonnell:—business persons than men. I agree that many of them give very good advice to their husbands.

Can the Leader of the Government advise me whether he received a letter from the Prime Minister advising him that not only he but also his spouse and his family must be considered? Therefore, under the terms of that letter which he received from the Prime Minister—if, indeed, he received one—is he breaking the guidelines as set out by the Prime Minister?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I received the letter, as did other cabinet ministers. If my honourable friend will take the trouble to read all of it, he will find that the guidelines have not been broken.

Senator Bonnell: Did the Prime Minister say anything to you about your spouse and your children?

Senator Roblin: I do not report to my friend on what the Prime Minister says to me about my spouse and my children.

Senator Flynn: You read it.

Senator Bonnell: Since the letter is in the public domain and I do not have a copy, would the Leader of the Government table the letter?

Senator Roblin: If it is in the public domain, then my honourable friend can get it for himself. That is the tradition in Parliament. The government does not make itself responsible for providing information of that kind. I will make sure that I am correct in saying that it is in the public domain, because if I am not, then it is another matter. I will check that.

Senator Frith: Why not table it?

Senator Bonnell: Would the Leader of the Government do me the courtesy of advising me, if he thinks the letter is in the public domain, whether it states in that letter that not only he but also his wife and children should be considered?

AGRICULTURE

WHEAT—TWO-PRICE SYSTEM—EFFECT OF PRICE INCREASE

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, my third question follows that asked by Senator Argue with regard to the announcement by the Prime Minister today concerning the price of wheat.

I agree that agriculture in this country has reached a crisis. I have been saying that for some time. There is a crisis in the east and in the west, and something has to be done about it. But there is also another crisis, and I refer to the poor of this country, to the low-income and middle-income people. If that is the case, is it right to increase the price of bread? Would it not be better to assist farmers in some direct way, perhaps to assist them with their financial loans and by other methods, rather than raise the price of bread for low-income and middle-income Canadians? Once again, those people are getting it in the neck.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My honourable friend might like to appear before the committee that is dealing with this matter and give it the benefit of his views. They sound interesting to me.

PUBLIC WORKS

PRINCE ALBERT, SASKATCHEWAN—AWARDING OF CONTRACT FOR FEDERAL BUILDING

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, a very wise man, whom some of you will remember—the Right Honourable John Diefenbaker—once advised me “Never ask a question that you don’t know the answer to, if you are talking in the House or the Senate.”

My question, which goes against that advice, is one to which I really do not know the answer and, therefore, I ask the Leader of the Government to find the answer. Briefly, the Canadian government is building a federal building in Prince Albert, a city of some 35,000 people. Now, they need that federal building in the city of Prince Albert like they need a hole in the head, because they have all kinds of federal buildings and all kinds of other space. However, they are building it, and almost all of the people of Prince Albert are delighted that this building is being built—especially Conservatives!

An Hon. Senator: And the NDP.

Senator Steuart: When they built this building, which in my opinion, and in the opinion of many other objective observers, is a political building and not a really necessary building, they stopped short of going all the way. When they asked for architects to submit tenders, bids or proposals to build this building, they missed the one large architectural firm in Prince Albert. There are several small architectural firms in Prince Albert and one large one—Mr. Tomporowski, a good Ukrainian chap, or perhaps he is Polish, which is even better; Mr. Moore, who was Hungarian but changed his name; and a fellow named Taylor, who is an Anglican. That covers the whole spectrum, and two out of three of them vote Conservative—put a little bid in, but they were not even considered. They are considering firms from Saskatoon who sent, for some strange reason, two good Progressive Conservatives here to Ottawa.

● (1440)

My question and my plea to the Leader of the Government is: Will he go back and talk to the Minister of Public Works, or whatever they call him now, and ask him to reconsider—since the building is, in my opinion, totally unnecessary and the whole thing is political to begin with. Ask him why he will not go all the way, do it right, and at least consider the Prince Albert architectural firm. If they are no good, then he can reject them, but at least give them a chance. Will the leader find that out for me?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when it comes to the question of buildings in Prince Albert—

Senator Marshall: It is a specialized area.

Senator Roblin:—whether they are political or otherwise, I respect my honourable friend’s status as an expert.

Senator Argue: He put in an airport.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I do not know what the leader means by that comment. He respects me and I respect him, but will he get me an answer? To hell with respect! Will he get me an answer so I can answer the letter I got from them?

Senator Roblin: I suggest to my honourable friend that he send me the letter and I will answer it.

THE CABINET

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I rise to help the Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Doody: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: This is Question Period.

Senator Sinclair: I have turned up a facsimile of the letter he received and which was made public. I would like to read part of it.

Because of a wish to continue the practice of avoiding the imposed subordination of the interests and independence in the affairs of one family member to those of another, this Code, as was the case with the previous Guidelines, does not apply to the spouses or dependent children of public office holders. However, I wish it to be understood clearly by all Ministers that they have an individual responsibility to prevent conflicts of interest, including those that might arise out of activities of their spouses or dependent children or the dealings in property or investments which are owned or managed, in whole or in part, by their spouses or dependent children.

My question is: Is that still government policy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the answer is that the situation to which my honourable friend refers has been referred to the officials in charge of conflict of interest, and they have declared that there is none.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I do not want to press anything, but I asked a very simple question. I read an extract and I asked whether that is still government policy.

Senator Roblin: I think I have answered the question.

Senator Sinclair: I shall have to check the “blues.”

Senator Flynn: Try again tomorrow.

Senator Frith: What is the point?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a different question concerning the same matter. The Leader of the Government has said that it referred to somebody-general. Is it his job, every time somebody's spouse wants to make a deal, to approve it or reject it? I thought that all he did was, as each minister of the Crown advised him of his or her outside interests, accept the submissions on assets and conflicts. He does not sit down with each submission and say, "This is a conflict." "This is not a conflict." "You can't do this deal." "You cannot do that." "You cannot buy this." "Your wife cannot do this." That is not his job. I understood that his job was simply to accept what is submitted and take your word for it. He does not get you to take an oath, to swear, nor does he look at every one of the deals and ask, "Is this a good one?" or, "Is this a bad one?" You do not have to submit something every time one of your children or your wife makes a deal. If that is the case, that everybody—wife, children, spouse—must submit to this general you are talking about, every deal they make on property, real estate or whatever, to have it okayed, then did he say it was okay in this case?

Senator Roblin: What is the question?

Senator Bonnell: The question is: Do you, your spouse and your children have to submit details on every property deal, real estate deal and so forth made during the four years while you are a member of the government?

Senator Roblin: My eligible assets have been placed in a blind trust.

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. I would like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate whether the Prime Minister's new guidelines for conflicts of interest apply also to his ministerial assistants and to his Parliamentary secretaries?

Senator Flynn: That is a very important question.

Senator Roblin: There are guidelines in respect of all senior people in government.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have three delayed answers.

CORRECTIONAL SERVICE

COMMISSIONER'S OFFICE—INCREASED COST OF ADMINISTRATION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the following reply is in response to a question raised in the Senate on April 16, 1986, by the Honourable Earl A. Hastings, regarding the Commissioner's Office of the Correctional Service, and the increased cost of administration.

(The answer follows:)

Operating Expenditure allocations to the "Office of the Commissioner" have remained relatively static at approximately $750,000 per annum and three (3) person-years for the forecast period. These resources include both direct costs (salaries and other operating costs) as well as a provision of approximately $450,000 for special projects deemed essential by the Commissioner.

However, as operational requirements are identified, the resources for special projects are reallocated by the Commissioner to the managers conducting the special projects. The associated expenditures are then reflected in the manager's budget as part of the cost of their operations. For the fiscal year 1985-86, these resources were utilized to fund 21 special studies emanating from the "Report of the Advisory Committee to the Solicitor General on the Management of Correctional Institutions" and directions from the Ministers of the Treasury Board. In addition, an in-house study to articulate the "Report on the Statement of CSC Values" was undertaken.

In fact, the direct costs of operating the Commissioner's Office, in concert with the Government's restraint measures, have declined from $318,000 for fiscal year 1984-85 to a forecast of $256,000 in 1985-86, a decrease of 19.5 per cent. The current forecast indicates that the direct costs will not vary substantially in 1986-87.

With respect to the staffing level displayed in Part III of the Estimates, the person-year allocation has remained constant while the actual utilization from one fiscal year to the next has varied slightly.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

MEETING BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES—U.S. AGRICULTURE POLICY AS AGENDA ITEM

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised in the Senate on April 29, 1986, by the Honourable Hazen Argue, regarding the meeting between the Prime Minister and the President of the United States—U.S. agriculture policy as an agenda item. The first reply was tabled in the chamber on April 15, 1986, and I am just confirming it.

Senator Argue: Thank you.

(The answers follows:)

Canadian concerns over certain provisions of the 1985 U.S. Food Security Act (Farm Bill) were raised by the Prime Minister during discussions with President Reagan, Secretary of State Shultz, Secretary of Agriculture Lyng, U.S. Trade Representative Yeutter and with the leadership of the Senate. Prime Minister Mulroney noted the problems affecting farmers on both sides of the border, indicating that the recently announced reduction in the 1986 loan rate for wheat and other crops receiving price support would only worsen the current situation of low world prices for these commodities. He also pointed out Canadian concerns about the high level of agricultural export subsidies contained in the legislation and about possible restrictions on the movement of Canadian livestock products to the United States. The Prime Minister asked for U.S. understanding and co-operation regarding Canada's desire to ensure that conditions in the international trading environment did not further deteriorate. The U.S. response in the discussions was to observe that many of the export programs were aimed at the European Community not at Canada, but that Canadian concerns would be noted and all possible done to not harm friendly trading nations such as Canada. The United States and Canada share many objectives in regard to the upcoming multilateral trade negotiations in the GATT and both countries are looking for an improved set of rules and procedures for trade in agricultural products.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE SALE OF CN ROUTE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question raised in the Senate on April 17, 1986, by the Honourable Edward M. Lawson, regarding Transport and government action on the possible sale of CN Route.

Hon. Charles Turner: May we have that reply read?

Senator Roblin: Yes. The minister said in the House of Commons on April 18:

—the CN management and board have agreed in principle to a proposal to sell CN Route. Within the context of that agreement there will be provision for certain job guarantees. Indeed, those details are being worked out at the present time. Of course, the Hon. Member should be aware that the final package will have to be approved by the Governor-in-Council and the CTC. Until such time as all of these details can be worked out with the unions and all other parties affected, we are not in a position to say just what the full package will look like.

He went on to say:

—in the past CN has been very generous in its severance arrangements and early retirement packages. These kinds of arrangements are being negotiated with the unions within the context of the purchase agreement which has been put together.

In his press release of April 17, 1986, Mr. LeClair stated:

Canadian National and the purchaser will ensure any affected management and staff are treated fairly and equitably through early retirement and other measures. This will require negotiations with the unions involved.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question arising from that answer? I did not hear the first part of the answer. Is it a guarantee that there will be job protection for all employees involved in that CN Route sale?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, perhaps my honourable friend should read the answer in Hansard, and if he has any further questions, no doubt he can raise them.

Senator Thériault: You are very obliging today!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Oh, Duff, you did that all the time when you were given answers. It is a practice that you started, and I do not know why you will not let Senator Thériault do it.

Senator Flynn: You are not obliged to protect him.

Senator Frith: I am not obliged to protect anyone. Honourable senators, on a point of order, when—

An Hon. Senator: Order!

An Hon. Senator: The clerk is trying to read the first order.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Frith: Order is right. I am trying to raise a point of order. A point of order can be raised at any time.

An Hon. Senator: It takes precedence over all other business.

Senator Flynn: Go ahead.

Senator Frith: With reference to the question just asked by Senator Thériault, he was merely asking the leader to read again the first part of the question so that he could ask the leader a question about it. When the Leader of the Government occupied the seat I now occupy, he frequently asked questions arising out of delayed answers. That is why I have asked and am asking now, why he would not extend the same courtesy to Senator Thériault.

Senator Roblin: On the point of order, several senators during the recent past have raised questions arising out of delayed answers, and I have answered them on the spot. My problem with the question asked by my honourable friend, if I understood him correctly, is that he is asking me to interpret what was in that statement, which is a statement by the Minister of Transport, and I am not able to do that. If he gives me a question, I will take it as notice, because I cannot really answer it on the spur of the moment. However, if he wants to give me a question for me to take as notice, there is no reason why he cannot do so even now, as far as I am concerned.

● (1450)

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, I have always had a lot of respect for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This is the first time that he has treated me in this way. However, it seems to me that my question was most appropriate. The fact is that I did not quite hear whether or not the Leader of the Government said "all the jobs". That was the question I asked, because I am presently doing some research on that subject matter and I thought I could perhaps have the small point cleared up right now of whether the Leader of the Government had said "all jobs will be protected," or "some jobs will be protected." That was my question. I did not think I was asking for an interpretation.

Senator Roblin: I think if my friend is able to read the answers which have now left my hand, he will see, if my memory is correct, that there was no guarantee that all jobs would be preserved but rather that the people who were put out of work would receive proper treatment with respect to their situation.

Senator Thériault: I would like to thank the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Senator Roblin: However, let me just add a proviso. That is what I think is said in there, but in view of the way some people are treating me in respect of the answers they get to questions, I want to issue the warning that I will not be bound by this answer and I intend to look at it.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, it may be all right for the Leader of the Government in the Senate to take revenge because of the way that some people have treated him but I think I can stand here and say to honourable senators and to him that I have always treated him with all the respect that his position deserves. I would also say to him that if he wants to make accusations, he should not include me.

Senator Roblin: I am glad to exclude my friend, and I exclude most senators.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport".—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Flynn.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I will not detain you very long.

[Translation]

I have had a look at Bill S-8 and I can appreciate the good intentions of Senator Haidasz with respect to the prohibition of smoking.

Still I would not want this measure to be given second reading without a few senators—I, for one—being afforded an opportunity to express concern.

I can see where the adoption of such a bill by the House of Commons would be the laughing stock of all Canadians, for there is more to it than saying that smoking is a bad habit.

As a result of the adoption of the report of the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders chaired by Senator Molgat, we decided to add a rule to ban smoking in committee rooms. In this respect, I pointed out that our rules do not even include a prohibition against smoking in the Senate itself. It is only because of custom and propriety that we frown upon smoking here. I would have nothing against a decision to ban smoking in a place like this and in committee rooms.

If you read the bill and if we were to adopt it as is, you will see that no person shall smoke in any indoor place of work provided by the Senate or the House of Commons, the government of Canada, or a federal work undertaking or business within the meaning of the Canada Labour Code. In other words, honourable senators, we would be endorsing the principle whereby smoking is prohibited outside the Senate, in the lobby and hallways. So far I agree, but the ban would even extend to your offices because they are indoor places of work provided by Parliament, the Senate, the House of Commons, or the Government of Canada. That is what it would amount to.

For example, we would be up against a rather ridiculous situation in the sense that smoking would be banned when we are reading newspapers in the reading room. Perhaps the ban would be lifted whenever His Honour the Speaker gives a reception because, all of a sudden, that room is no longer a place of work.

In fact, I fully understand the suggestion of Senator Haidasz. I wish I had made this a notice of inquiry to discuss whether we can eventually ban smoking. Of course the bill is limited to parliamentary jurisdiction, meaning places of work provided by the Government of Canada, the Senate or the House of Commons where smoking would be prohibited. The ban would not extend to places to work provided by provincial governments.

One would have to be very careful when going from one place to another and make sure that one is no longer under federal jurisdiction should one be tempted to light up.

I find this formula amusing. For instance, a train passenger who has reserved a roomette would not be allowed to smoke there because it would be prohibited under this bill. There might be exceptions—indeed, exceptions could be made—but still the bill is going too far.

I have no objection if the underlying theme of the speech delivered by Senator Haidasz is to refer the bill to a committee. On the other hand, I am sure we cannot seriously entertain the suggestion that the bill might eventually be adopted by the Senate and reported by a committee with a favourable recommendation.

If honourable senators feel that the bill should be referred to committee, I agree. But I think it would be somewhat childish if, under the pretense of debating the problem of smoking hazards, we were to adopt the principle of such an excessive bill. Personally, I will say "on division". In fact, I would suggest the Senate would be unwise to pass this measure. I think it would be better if Senator Haidasz were to agree to withdraw his bill and replace it by a notice of inquiry under which the Senate or a committee—for instance, the Senate Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology—would be asked to study the hazards of smoking, and to what extent individual freedoms in that respect can be restricted in both Houses, senators' offices, train roomettes, or in other such exaggerated situations as described in the bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if I correctly understood Senator Flynn's intervention, he emphasized certain aspects concerning the wording of this measure which casts a very wide net. Among other things he mentioned offices which will be covered under this legislation. I agree with him. He also mentioned other places as examples, and we could think of a few more.

In my opinion, if we can accept the principle of the bill on second reading, we can also refer it to committee, as he said, to change the wording and improve it. At the same time the committee could debate the various aspects of the principle of the bill.

For that reason I support the second reading motion, given the commitment of the sponsor of the bill that it will be referred to committee for further consideration in the usual way. Then we can wait for the committee report.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, this brings to mind a matter I brought up a few years ago. At that time I said that I felt strongly that we should not always think we have to give second reading to a bill in order to refer the bill to a committee. We did refer a bill to a committee before second reading three or four years ago, but I have forgotten the exact bill the Senate was dealing with then. I think this is a case where the Senate might refer a bill to a committee before it receives second reading, and after the committee has reported, the Senate can then decide whether it wants to approve the bill in principle by giving it second reading.

That is something that should be looked into. Therefore, I wish to adjourn the debate to refresh my memory as to the other occasion on which we adopted that course.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the second reading of Bill C-62, respecting employment equity.

She said: Honourable senators, it is with great pleasure and a certain amount of pride that I rise today to introduce Bill C-62, respecting employment equity.

This is an historic piece of legislation. For the first time in the history of our country we have a piece of legislation that enshrines the principle of equality in the workplace. Bill C-62 guarantees that the barriers to women, native people, disabled persons and visible minorities will start to fall. This bill reinforces the principles many of us fought for under section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It puts into practice the ideals in our Constitution.

This bill recognizes that the realization of the goal of employment equity takes more than treating people in the same way. It requires that special measures be taken to improve the employment opportunities of certain groups and that appropriate accommodation be made in the workplace for differences.

Initially it was assumed by legislators, employers and the public that equality in the workplace could be attained by treating everyone the same. But this legislation reflects the conviction that evolved as a result of the report of Judge Rosalie Abella on equality in employment—that equality can only be attained by recognizing differences and making reasonable accommodation for those differences.

The purpose of this bill is “to achieve equality in the workplace so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability and . . . to correct the conditions of disadvantage in employment . . .” experienced by these groups.

This legislation is the major component in a series of measures undertaken by the government to achieve greater social justice in the field of employment.

As an indication of its commitment to equity, and as an example for private sector employers, this government has built into the Canadian Jobs Strategy the requirement that these same groups be targeted for special consideration regarding training programs and job opportunities.

The government's record on this is undeniable. If we examine the 574,000 new jobs that have been created in the past 19 months, we see that women account for 243,000 of these.

Government recognized the need for an employment equity program of its own months before a decision on Bill C-62 was made. I am pleased to report that Treasury Board instituted a mandatory program of employment equity for all public service hirings more than a year ago, and that the government's provisions for contract compliance for companies of more than 100 employees who bid on contracts valued at over $200,000 are set and ready to be instituted.

These are the reasons that the inclusion of the federal public service under the terms of Bill C-62 would have been a redundancy in the legislation.

All of these initiatives will become the cornerstone for the establishment of equity throughout the Canadian labour market. It is now time for the private sector to embrace the philosophy and basic tenets of employment equity.

Employers must work with the government to eliminate discrimination and to open up competition for employment opportunities to all Canadians.

Honourable senators, the Canadian people have given this government a mandate to bring about economic renewal and to ensure that all Canadians participate fairly in the process. It is moving ahead quickly and decisively on both counts. Growth and equity must go hand in hand. It is a matter of fairness and it is a matter of sound management.

In the past, certain groups have been excluded from the workplace or under-utilized because of systemic or attitudinal barriers. We simply cannot afford to waste any of our valuable human resources. It is not only unfair, it is inefficient, because equity in the workplace is a key to economic growth.

[Senator Flynn.]

Bill C-62 will ensure that in addition to economic growth, renewed confidence and lower unemployment, there will be a fair distribution of the jobs created.

This legislation will cover federally-regulated employers in the fields of banking, transportation and communications. It will ensure that employers accept the responsibility for establishing equal access in the workplace. They must identify barriers to target groups and remove them. They must adopt special measures that will involve senior level commitment and management accountability. They must begin immediately hiring and training target group members in all levels of the organization. In fact, it will ensure that employers prove their commitment to this goal by providing data recording their progress.

Bill C-62 focuses on results, and I think that is very important. As long as the results are there, employers are permitted the flexibility to adopt the approach that best suits their organization.

Employment equity is not a numbers game to be played by filling quotas. Quotas are rigid and, therefore, inflexible and often unhelpful. Goals that have been set are flexible and establish standards against which achievements can be measured. The government believes that, in the light of the American experience and the complexity and diversity of Canada and its economy, the way to achieve change is not to institute a set of rigid procedures. Rather, to get results, this bill requires that employers disclose to the government and to the public, data that has never been available before, data that will verify their progress towards employment equity.

The other fundamental principle underlying Bill C-62 is the crucial role of enforcement. By this I mean the collection of data by employers on the hirings, promotions, terminations and salary ranges of members of designated groups. This is data which we have never had before. If the results are not forthcoming, honourable senators, if the data indicate a failure to comply with employment equity, the government intends to exert the strongest possible pressure.

This bill puts information about the status of target groups on public record, holding the performance of individual employers up to public scrutiny. They will be compared unfavourably with their competitors in the same industry. I do not know of any employer who would be willing or foolish enough to take this risk.

● (1510)

But if they do, the full power and authority of the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be brought to bear. It will have the data it needs to initiate investigation.

The use of the Canadian Human Rights Commission—in an expanded capacity—to police this piece of legislation saves us from creating another level of bureaucracy. It means that this piece of legislation will be overseen by an organization with the experience to make it a most effective tool in combating the inequalities in our system.

I believe that the majority of employers will co-operate fully. Most corporations will make good use of the data themselves to identify problems and correct them without going through a complaint and risking the terms of their compliance dictated by tribunals or courts.

The commission will use its power to initiate a complaint under the Canadian Human Rights Act only if it is warranted. But let there be no doubt that Bill C-62, in conjunction with the Canadian Human Rights Commission and public opinion, will provide a very formidable enforcement system for employment equity.

However, we are seeing evidence that many businesses are already moving to establish employment equity timetables and goals even before they are required to by law. And they are committed to it.

Companies, such as the Royal Bank of Canada, state that "True equal opportunity is a way of doing business. It reflects excellence in human resource management and we are determined to continue our efforts in this area."

I am quoting now from the President of Westinghouse, who states:

We see the program as supportive of our strategic objectives. By supporting employment equity, we feel we are contributing to a fundamental social change.

Companies are realizing that factors such as sex, race, disabilities or skin colour are really irrelevant in today's labour market. The only question when staffing should be: Can the candidate do the job? That is the only criterion by which potential employees should be assessed, and with this legislation, it will be.

Honourable senators, we need this bill. It is long overdue. Canadians have a right to equal access to employment opportunities and past governments have been remiss in not recognizing that right with legislation.

With business showing an increasing understanding and acceptance of the bill and with the Canadian Human Rights Commission confident and eager to enforce the bill, it would seem wise for us to proceed with the study of this bill as soon as possible.

This bill represents nearly two years of consultation with more than 120 groups and organizations across the country, scrutiny and amendment in the legislative committees—and I do not have to remind you of the very long debate in the House of Commons.

Upon passage, it will finally provide Canada with a framework for employment equity. It is an end to the years of government inaction and it offers Canadians the employment equity legislation that they deserve—a special blend of what is necessary, what is fair, and, more importantly, what is workable.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marsden, debate adjourned.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LIMITED DIVESTITURE AUTHORIZATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-87, to authorize the divestiture of Canadian Arsenals Limited and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I rise today to speak to Bill C-87, which is a bill to authorize the government to divest itself of the shares of Canadian Arsenals Limited—which I would like to refer to for the rest of this discussion as CAL—to a private sector purchaser, thereby completing the privatization of CAL announced in the budget speech on May 23, 1985.

CAL is the last government owned munitions enterprise in Canada. Its privatization, therefore, means that Canada's munitions business is now conducted totally in the private sector.

As we all know, the government has agreed in principle to sell CAL to the SNC Group of Montreal; a large, widely-held engineering company with worldwide experience.

Before getting down to some of the specifics of the bill before us and the terms of the sale to SNC, I thought it might be instructive to review briefly CAL's history and current position.

CAL was created in 1945 in order to consolidate the government-owned and operated munitions facilities that had sprung up during the war. These facilities at that time were located across Canada, but primarily in Ontario and Quebec. During its early years in business, CAL progressively consolidated its operations and closed down several redundant or inefficient facilities.

In 1951, CAL leased its gun division facilities at Longueuil, Quebec to Sorel Industries. The facilities were disposed of completely by the end of the 1950s.

In 1963, CAL closed down its general ammunition division at Lindsay, Ontario.

In 1964, the Instrument and Radar Division at Leaside, Ontario, was closed down. The assets were either sold or transferred to the private sector under the direction of the Department of Defence Production.

In 1965, the Explosives Division at Valleyfield, Quebec was sold to CIL. The plant is now owned by Expro Chemical Production Incorporated and supplies CAL with almost 100 per cent of its propellant and explosives requirement.

In the mid-1960s CAL discontinued the manufacturing of munitions below 30 millimetre. It sold its plant located in Valcartier to IVI, Industrie Valcartier Inc., of Quebec. IVI was purchased by SNC in 1980 and continues to produce munitions of 30 millimetre and below for sale largely to the Department of National Defence.

In 1976, CAL divested itself of its small arms business located in Mississauga to Diemaco Ltd. of Kitchener, Ontario, leaving CAL with only its Le Gardeur plant in Quebec.

Also in 1976, the Government of Canada ordered a reorganization to enhance efficiency. Revised letters patent were issued to allow CAL to expand the scope of its operations into related military products and to export munitions. The government also committed itself to substantial modernization of CAL's facilities, ultimately to a total of $3.7 million spent between 1977 and 1982.

In 1978, CAL moved its headquarters from Ottawa to Le Gardeur, northeast of Montreal.

In 1980 and 1981, the Auditor General's Annual Reports to Parliament were critical of the organization of CAL's facilities at Le Gardeur, claiming that they were disjointed and inefficient. Equipment was owned by the Department of Supply and Services; land and buildings were owned by the Department of Public Works, and other assets fell under CAL's own administration. Consequently, in 1982 everything but title to the land was transferred to CAL. The land ownership still resides with the Department of Public Works and will be transferred to CAL before completion of the sale to SNC.

In 1984, CAL completed installation of a new cartridge case manufacturing facility at St. Augustin, near Quebec City, at a total cost of $13 million.

CAL's operations are now centralized at Ville Le Gardeur and St. Augustin in Quebec. It employs some 750 people at Le Gardeur and 50 more at St. Augustin.

CAL's financial performance has steadily improved since 1979. In 1979 sales totalled $14.2 million with a profit of $181,000. In 1985 sales totalled $103 million with a profit of $11.3 million.

Yet, there remains room for improvement. One priority is to expand and modernize facilities at Le Gardeur. More importantly, since 1978 CAL's mandate had been to promote exports. Management, however, in spite of valiant attempts, has been unable to increase exports above 7.3 per cent of total sales. Privatization will assist CAL immeasurably in these two areas.

● (1520)

Pursuant to the Minister of Finance's budget announcement in May, 1985, the Department of Supply and Services set up an interdepartmental privatization panel for CAL, consisting of representatives of the Department of Supply and Services, Treasury Board and the Department of Justice.

The government also commissioned the firm of Arthur Andersen and Associates to perform a valuation of CAL. Arthur Andersen estimated the value range for CAL to be from $80 million to $98 million.

Next, the privatization panel solicited bids from private sector firms and consortia. In return for a $100,000 deposit from each, nine bidders obtained commercially confidential information on CAL as well as access to CAL's facilities. Eight of these nine firms submitted their first formal bids by August 9, 1985.

A process of negotiations with the bidders ensued, during which the government's policy for the operation of CAL in the private sector crystallized. The six bidders that agreed to meet all of the government's policy conditions were asked to submit their final offers by November 19, 1985. Obviously, by this time, price was the only material difference amongst bids and bidders were informed that price would be the determining factor.

On the basis of the final bids submitted, SNC was the successful bidder. On December 2, 1985, the Minister of Supply and Services announced agreement in principle to the sale of CAL as a going concern to SNC. The major reason for selling CAL as a going concern rather than selling the assets was to ensure that all of CAL's liabilities as well as its assets followed CAL into the private sector. I might say that this was, as much as anything, to avoid the Ontario government's problem in the privatization of UTDC where substantial liabilities remain with the government.

The major terms of the sale are as follows:

First, SNC agreed to pay a total of $92,224,941 to the Government of Canada for all of CAL's issued and outstanding shares. The price paid included $4,724,541 to repay the outstanding debt of CAL to the Government of Canada. The net price paid to the government was $87,500,000.

Second, SNC agreed in principle to sign a "Reciprocal Pension Transfer Agreement" with the Government of Canada whereby CAL's current employees may transfer their government pension credits to a newly-created CAL pension plan that is materially the same.

Third, CAL entered into a new labour agreement with its employees just prior to the final bids being submitted. SNC has agreed to abide by that agreement until it is able to reach a new agreement with the employees after the purchase is consummated.

Fourth, although it is not a formal undertaking, SNC has agreed to maintain the current level of employment at CAL.

Fifth, SNC has plans for the expansion and development of the two plants in Quebec.

Finally, CAL is largely what economists call a "monopsony"—one buyer and one seller for the products produced. The buyer of over 90 per cent of CAL's munitions is, of course, the Department of National Defence. CAL is treated as a preferred supplier to DND in order to guarantee a secure Canadian source of munitions supply, and the price paid by DND was negotiated on the basis of cost, business risk and fair and reasonable profit.

CAL's preferred supplier status will persist under SNC's ownership. During the bidding process, there was concern that the government, as principal purchaser of CAL's product, would, in effect, be subsidizing the purchase price: The higher the purchase price, the higher the price paid by DND for CAL's products.

To guard against this eventuality, the government has agreed with SNC that the cost base—I spent a lot of my time working for a utility, so I would call it the "rate base"—is fixed at the net book value of CAL at the time of sale, regardless of the purchase price. I am told that the net book value of CAL is roughly $52.5 million, so the additional $30 million premium paid by SNC is not part of what I call the "rate base."

In my view, CAL's acquisition by SNC makes good sense. SNC, through its subsidiary IVI, now manufactures smaller ammunition—up to .33 mm—not produced by CAL. There will, therefore, be a high degree of synergy and economies of scale between the two operations.

SNC has been in existence since 1903 and has become one of Canada's leading engineering, construction and manufacturing firms. Its assets are in excess of $100 million. Its 1984 revenues exceeded $200 million. SNC's size and experience will allow it to enhance CAL's research and development activities. Its international network and reputation will allow CAL to broaden its export activities.

SNC is an employee-owned company. It has roughly 4,000 employees across Canada of whom 500 are also SNC shareholders. The vast majority of SNC's shareholders are resident Canadians. CAL will, therefore, continue to be a Canadian owned and operated company. I also understand that SNC is contemplating a public issue of shares in the near future, thereby combining employee ownership with a wide public shareholding.

I shall turn to the specifics of the bill now before us. As I mentioned earlier, this bill is enabling legislation which, when passed, will authorize the minister to divest of CAL "on such terms and conditions as are approved by the Governor in Council." This bill is modelled on—in fact, it is virtually identical to—the bill passed last year to privatize Northern Transportation Company Limited.

Express Parliamentary authority is required to privatize a parent crown corporation pursuant to subsection 100(1)(d) of the Financial Administration Act. Some of you might wonder why the de Havilland privatization did not require legislation. The reason is that de Havilland was not a parent crown corporation, but was, instead, a subsidiary of the CDIC.

Honourable senators, one point I should like to make in this regard is that I cannot for the life of me understand why the NTCL and CAL bills were drafted as enabling legislation. In both cases the buyers had been selected and the terms and conditions of the transactions agreed upon before the legislation was tabled. Why then, instead of enabling legislation, does not the government seek Parliamentary approval for the actual sale? Surely that was the intent and the spirit of the Financial Administration Act.

Otherwise, C-87 is a relatively straightforward bill. Clause 5 requires the new owners of CAL to prepare proposed articles of amendment for CAL within four months and submit them to the Minister of Supply and Services for approval. This enables the government to ensure that the amended articles are consonant with the terms and conditions of the sale.

Clause 6 requires the articles of CAL to restrict non-resident Canadian ownership of CAL to an aggregate maximum of 25 per cent of the voting shares. This arrangement will persist in perpetuity unless a government and Parliament at some future date consent to an amendment.

Clause 8 enables the government to make the necessary adjustments to the public accounts to reflect CAL's sale. I do not profess to be particularly knowledgeable in accounting—especially in government accounting—but I understand, however, that the transaction will be reflected as follows: First, the “value” of CAL is currently carried in the government’s books—the Public Accounts of Canada—at $4.7 million. This is the amount of outstanding debt owed by CAL to Her Majesty. The fact that CAL records shareholders’ equity of roughly $50 million in its own books is apparently of no consequence.

Second, the gross sale price of $92.2 million will be paid by SNC into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and recorded as “budgetary revenues.” The amount of $4.7 million of that will be absorbed by cancelling out the $4.7 million value of CAL currently recorded in the government’s books. This obviously leaves a total of $87.5 million that will be recorded as a net budgetary revenue and will reduce the deficit accordingly.

As co-chairman of our party’s crown corporations task force prior to the election, I was often either amazed or totally baffled by the government’s accounting practices and policies for crown corporations.

Clauses 9 and 10 remove crown corporation status from CAL as well as agent of Her Majesty status. Removal of agent status removes from the corporation all of the immunities that apply by virtue of its ownership by the Crown. Such privileges and immunities are, however, inappropriate for a private sector corporation. One of the more significant immunities resulting from agent status is exemption from a range of federal and provincial taxes and fees. Under SNC’s ownership, CAL will become a fully taxable entity with, we hope, positive results for the treasuries of Quebec and Canada.

Honourable senators, during debate on this bill in the other place, there was some concern expressed that a privately-owned CAL with an avowed intention to increase exports might drag Canada into the international arms business, with all the risks and moral issues that that would raise. I simply point out that CAL will continue to need export permits from the Government of Canada for any munitions sold abroad. That mechanism will provide the Government of Canada with an effective safeguard against munitions sales that embarrass Canada or are inconsistent with our foreign policy objectives. I am told that Canada’s safeguards in this respect are among the most restrictive in the world. Furthermore, the minister’s office has informed me that there are only six firms in Canada that produce munitions for export. It is therefore, in terms of size, a relatively easy industry to regulate.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, that concludes my remarks. As I said, this is a relatively simple and straightforward bill. I am sure that SNC, CAL management and employees and the government look forward to its expeditious passage.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have listened with interest to Senator Kelly’s remarks in moving second reading of Bill C-87, having to do with the divestiture of Canadian Arsenals Limited. I am tempted, but I shall try to do it only in an abbreviated way, to talk a little bit about the general philosophy relating to crown corporations, their operation as government agencies, and their disposition. I do not suppose that this is really germane to the present debate. The government of the day has decided, as a matter of policy, that it is going to dispose of some crown agencies. Generally speaking, I agree with this, although my own view as to which corporations might be sold first is probably different from that of the present government. For example, it would seem to me that it would be more logical for the Government of Canada to divest itself of Petro-Canada than Canadian Arsenals. I can see no reason why the Government of Canada needs to be in the service station business, but, technically speaking, honourable senators, that issue is not before us today.

If the government is going to retain some crown corporations and sell others, decisions have to be made by the government of the day as to which ones are going to be sold. The present government has decided that it is going to sell Canadian Arsenals.

Canadian Arsenals in particular, in recent years, has been a reasonably profitable company. Here I just interject one other thought having to do with my general philosophy about governments being in business, in competition with private enterprise, and it is that if governments are going to be in this kind of business, then they ought not to be required to restrict themselves only to those enterprises which cannot operate at a profit or which operate at a loss. As I say, if government is going to be in business, it ought to retain profitable businesses as well as some of those that are not profitable. Therefore, it is with some reluctance that I see the government divesting itself of Canadian Arsenals, which has been earning a few million dollars a year for it and which, according to the financial prognostications, is going to earn more money in the years ahead. That, I am sure, is a factor not lost sight of by SNC, the purchasers of Canadian Arsenals.

Senator Kelly has given us an interesting corporate history of Canadian Arsenals Limited and has said something about the purchaser, SNC. Therefore, I must say that, notwithstanding the general philosophical reservations to which I alluded previously, I have no objection to this bill. I do not propose that we should hinder the passage of Bill C-87.

As Senator Kelly has told us, the sale to SNC was a sale to the highest bidder after the government’s stipulations had been met by SNC and by some other bidders, as well. The company is an employee-owned company with a good history of proven competence. It must be said that the acquisition of Canadian Arsenals Limited goes well with SNC’s small arms ammunition manufacturing business, which it already owns, some of which it acquired directly or indirectly from Canadian Arsenals itself.

Honourable senators, there are a couple of other points that I wish to refer to. Canada is not bound, as Senator Kelly correctly tells us and as is provided for in the agreements which I have looked at, to buy exclusively from SNC, so that the question of putting SNC in a monopoly situation that might prove costly or even embarrassing to the Government of Canada need not arise. At the same time, it must be admitted that, if the Government of Canada did have to go offshore to buy medium and large sized ammunition and to do so over the heads of SNC, this would be most unfortunate and might, indeed, be embarrassing to the government of the day. Be that as it may, however, the government has protected its position in providing ammunition for its armed forces. This, I think, should be satisfactory.

It is the hope of SNC that its export market will increase, and I hope that it may, again subject to the restrictions which the laws of Canada quite properly provide as to the export of armaments to other countries.

I have one further comment to make, and that has to do with the employee pension entitlement. When the negotiations with SNC were first commenced, the position of the employees of Canadian Arsenals was left completely unattended to by the officials of the Government of Canada who had to deal with it. I am told that, had something not occurred to improve this situation, some employees might have lost their status under the Public Service Superannuation Act and had their pensions under the new arrangements reduced by many thousands of dollars per year. This, I am informed—it is, indeed, on the authority of the union representing the employees itself—has been entirely corrected, so that the pension arrangements of the employees of Canadian Arsenals Limited will be protected and will continue within and at the same rates provided under the Public Service Superannuation Act. The pensions of new employees of SNC, as they are engaged, will be a subject for determination between the union representing those employees and the company, SNC.

Honourable senators, this bill has already received the attention of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and, I believe, has been reported for the favourable consideration of this house. I do not propose and do not request that the bill be referred once again to that committee or, indeed, to any other committee of this house.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Kelly, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 9:

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (Budget).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I hope I will not abuse Senator Hicks' trust in Senator Gigantès and myself. However, I must raise a point that I would not have raised otherwise if it were not the first report—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Senator Tremblay, do you wish to move adoption of this report?

Senator Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, in a way I am raising a point of order.

It seems to me that this order does not appear in the correct place on the order paper. I suppose this is because it is the first time a report on committee financing is submitted according to the new procedure adopted around the end of March.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I will explain. The fact is that the purpose of this debate should not be merely consideration but also adoption by the Senate of the contents of the report, in other words, of the authorization to travel for the sub-committee chaired by Senator Gigantès.

So either we ignore the order's present placement on the order paper, and I move that the report be adopted, or I ask for leave to have yesterday's motion amended accordingly.

Mr. Speaker, what would be the best procedure?

● (1540)

[English]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Tremblay has pointed out, I believe this is the first report presented under the new procedural guidelines covered by section 2:07. The committee has gone through all the necessary steps, and now that the committee has followed the necessary requirements and has had its budget submitted and approved by the Internal Economy Committee, I believe that the next step would be to move the adoption of the report, so that the Senate can give the authority that was being requested.

We found on another occasion—I believe that Senator Flynn did it on a previous occasion—that during the consideration of a report it is in order to move its adoption or concurrence.

Senator Flynn: With leave.

Senator Frith: Perhaps with leave. I don't think you asked for leave at that time. In any event, if leave is sought, we certainly will agree.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: With leave of the Senate, I move the adoption of the Ninth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which respectfully asks that the committee or any sub-committee so authorized by the committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.

On motion of Senator Tremblay, report adopted.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Hicks).

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have only a few points to add to the debate on the report of the subcommittee studying the question of Billy Bishop and the film produced by the National Film Board entitled "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". This inquiry was prompted by Senator Molson, and I believe he is to be commended for what he has done. Furthermore, I believe that the speeches that have already been delivered in the Senate have dealt with the matter in a very adequate manner, starting off with the excellent tone set by Senator Everett's speech, and carrying right through to and including Senator Davey Stewart's remarks yesterday, when he made his points with his usual rapier-like thrusts and his usual engaging sense of humour.

Special reference should be made to the somewhat more tedious—I do not mean that in any derogatory sense—and detailed analysis of the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", by Senator Perrault. He pointed out, and put on the record, the many factual errors contained in the film.

I wish to point out—because it relates to my few concluding remarks—that those errors virtually—I say "virtually," but I really believe without exception—were all against rather than supportive of Billy Bishop and his reputation; and if this does not show a prejudice on the part of the National Film Board—which Senator Perrault documented for us so meticulously and so carefully the other day—then I do not know what, indeed, would show that.

I want also to make reference to the speech made by Senator Le Moyne. Certainly the Senate does not want to put itself in the position of a board of censors to the National Film Board. While Senator Le Moyne was supportive of the action and attitudes taken by the Senate report in this matter, he was particularly careful to point out that the Senate should not be the censor for the National Film Board.

At the same time, I believe that Senator Le Moyne conceded—or certainly it was implicit in his remarks—that the National Film Board does have a certain responsibility for what it does in the production of films of this kind. It is, after all, a public body, operating with public money, and it should operate, one should think, in support of the Canadian ethic, in support of Canada as a nation, and in support of our national pride in those heroes who have contributed to the history of this country; and generally it should be a cohesive and supportive agency for Canada.

When, as a senator, I spoke in this chamber very early in my career, I did so in connection with similar criticism of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. I quoted a friend of mine who unfortunately has since died, namely, the very distinguished professor W.A.C.H. Dobson, then of the University of Toronto, who said of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation at that time that sometimes it seemed to him that the CBC actually had a death wish for Canada. When I look at films like "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", produced by the National Film Board, I ask honourable senators whether one might not speculate that the National Film Board has a death wish for Canada itself—and this, in my view, is not good enough for a national agency like the National Film Board, which uses many scores—nay hundreds—of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

In the April 28 issue of Maclean's magazine, a columnist named Barbara Amiel referred to the National Film Board, and I would suggest that those who run the National Film Board and direct its activities should take her observations very seriously. She refers to a selection of films produced by the National Film Board, the first being "In The Best Interests of the Children". The quotation from the National Film Board's description of the film is:

This forceful film about the issue of child custody for lesbian mothers is a loving portrait of women and children and will destroy many stereotypes.

She then refers to: "Marriage: Is It a Health Hazard?", which is the name of another film by the National Film Board. Another is: "The Dream of a Free Country", which is an exposition of the Sandinista National Liberation Front in Nicaragua. "Growing Up Female"; "China: A Land Transformed". Many members of the National Film Board, and we might also say of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, seem to be in love with Maoism and all of the related philosophies.

● (1550)

Finally: "This is Only a Test". This film has to do with the National Film Board's handling of the cruise missile testing in northern Canada.

Ms. Amiel then goes on:

These films are arbitrarily selected, but they are representative of themes at the NFB. Although the NFB makes hundreds of films about apolitical subjects, insofar as it tackles issues, it does so from a particular bias. Thus the NFB catalogue will list films about the dangers of nuclear power rather than its advantages, techniques of union busting rather than the abuses of union power, pursuit of peace through disarmament or neutrality rather than strength or alliances.

Although the NFB distributes other countries' films, it will stock Shirley MacLaine on China rather than Britian's Lord Chalfont on totalitarianism. Surely the time has come to take a look at what is going on at the NFB.

She then continues:

It seems a good idea to have an NFB—or indeed a CBC and possibly a National Theatre as well. Nothing in this column is intended to attack the idea of such institutions. If they are well run and fulfil their mandates, they are money well spent, and a country as rich as Canada can afford them. The question is: what should be their mandate and is it being fulfilled?

In the case of the NFB, broadly speaking, the mandate probably has two areas. There is a significant archival function, which as far as I know, it does very well. This involves recording and cataloguing films about Canada. The second part of the mandate should be to provide an opportunity for the best film-makers to mirror the realities and aspirations of Canadians. Does the NFB do this?

She then goes on to suggest that it fails rather miserably in the doing of that. Her reference to the mandate relating to the archival function of the NFB prompts me to relate that to the handling of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". This film was first produced and issued as a documentary, and as a documentary, as I have already said and as other speakers have documented in much more detail than I have done, it contains a great many errors. I believe that it was only during the hearings before the Senate that representatives of the National Film Board tried to find an escape and said that the film was not intended to be a documentary and, so far as I was concerned, they coined a word that I had never heard before. They said it should not be referred to as a documentary; that it was a "docu-drama". According to their definition, a "docu-drama" did not have to be honest; it did not have to portray anything that had actually happened, except that it had to give effect to the prejudices of the particular producer of the particular film. It seems to me that this is exactly what was done from the beginning of his activities by the producer of the documentary—subsequently classified as a "docu-drama"—"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

Honourable senators, I think that it is not good enough for the National Film Board to display and to dramatize only what I have previously referred to as a death wish for Canada. It seems to me that, in authorizing the Senate committee to investigate this film and examine witnesses to disprove the historical allegations contained in the documentary—excuse me, "docu-drama"—"The Kid Who Couldn't Miss," the Senate has done a real service to the people of Canada. I suggest—and I do this in the most generous spirit—that the Senate committee may have done a real service to the National Film Board itself. I hope that the National Film Board will ponder on some of these things and, in the future, it should not put itself in the position where anyone can say that it has a death wish for Canada, its heroes and its history.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Sinclair, debate adjourned.

YOUTH

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, seconded by the Honourable Senator Frith, for the adoption of the Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on Youth, entitled: "Youth: A Plan of Action", tabled in the Senate on 19th February, 1986.—(Honourable Senator David).

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, this order stands in the name of Honourable Senator David. However, with the Senate's permission, I would like to participate in the debate at this time.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, as Senator Hays has said, this order stands in the name of Senator David, who is presently at a meeting of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. He has requested that the Senate give permission to Senator Hays to proceed.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Hays: Thank you, honourable senators.

In speaking to the committee report on Youth, I first want to congratulate the chairman, the deputy chairman and the members of the committee on their perceptive observations into the serious problems facing the young people of our country, and on their progressive and enlightened recommendations on how to work toward and find solutions to some of these difficult and threatening problems.

Our society is in a state of rapid transition from the Industrial Age, a by-product of which is pressure on and changing expectations for families, churches, schools and other institutions which have traditionally provided our children with more satisfactory direction and support during their formative years than is now the case. The committee has found that a large segment of Canada's youth faces an uncertain and not very promising future. It is tragic that so many Canadians are entering adulthood without the social skills and education they need to function in today's world; that so many of them are not equipped with the skills they need to set and achieve their goals; that so many of our youth are developing an attitude of cynicism, negativism and apathy. What an unacceptable waste of the most valuable source of productive potential for our country.

We have had, and will have more, I hope, excellent interventions from honourable senators on various aspects of the committee's report. For my part, I wish to comment on that part of the report dealing with what is probably the most valuable asset anyone can have—an education—and the important role played by the school in conferring that asset on our children. The school continues to serve all children, but whereas in previous years its main function was to teach the three Rs, it is now expected to provide for the needs of the "whole" child. This is a large expectation and a difficult one to fulfil because teachers are not equipped with all the skills they require to be all things to each child, nor do they have the necessary support to meet all the expectations of the community.

Professor Norman Henchey of McGill University has said:

Public education in Canada is being challenged by a variety of forces: declining enrolments, shrinking systems, limited resources, public disillusionment and criticism, and fragmentation of expectations. The rise of private schools in many areas, the popularity of alternative schools within the public sector and of religiously-oriented institutions, demands for special programs such as French immersion and computers, are all reflections of the breakdown of consensus about the functions and orientations of public schools.

This challenge, referred to by Professor Henchey, prompts us to examine our current system of education and ask ourselves if it meets our needs and if it can survive in its present form. From all indications in the committee's report, it does not and cannot. This report is not unique to Canada. No matter where one looks, other than perhaps in Japan, one finds the same crisis. It is simply a result of the rapidly changing times in which we live.

● (1600)

Professor Henchey suggests, and I quote:

—that there needs to be much more profound and sensitive conversation between educators and policymakers in political, cultural and economic institutions about such questions as how the Information Society is changing the context of learning, setting new goals and providing new opportunities; how the resources of the society can be used to promote learning in schools, colleges, universities and in other settings; and what the next generation of Canadians will need to learn in order to live and work in an interdependent, pluralist, and high-technology society.

There are still functions that the school systems can provide and should be able to perform very well, no matter what new directions education takes.

I agree with the view in the report that it is the first responsibility of the school systems to educate our children by producing students who are critical, literate thinkers; who have a sound knowledge of math and science; who can analyse a problem and make informed decisions; who can understand and appreciate our present problems, based on history; who have learned to accept responsibility for themselves and for others, and who respect their own rights and the rights of others. Once this solid base is established, the school systems should be preparing students for the work world by teaching technical skills. This view is supported by Monique Simard quoted in the Macdonald commission report. She emphasizes the fact that for worthwhile vocational training to occur, students must first have sound general grounding. The provinces have a responsibility to develop the concepts of education and training to complement each other and, thus, my strong support for the committee's recommendation for a task force on the co-ordination of educational qualifications.

From all indications in the report, the school systems in many instances are not able to provide for the special needs of a vast number of our youth. There are a great number who are caught in the grey area between those who go on to university and those who pursue a vocation. Even for those who go on to university, job opportunities are limited upon graduating. But for those who are caught between the two, they become bored, discouraged, disillusioned and leave school because they see little relevance in the courses they are taking as they lead to neither a guaranteed job nor higher education. As Brent

[Senator Hays.]

McKinnon, Director of the Edmonton Inner City Youth Project, pointed out:

School is always seen as the route to happiness, if part of being happy is having a job. In actual fact, the perception of school by too many young people as being a viable place to be is ending. Many young people do not feel that school is offering them what they have been promised. It is certainly not offering them jobs—nor involvement with the community in a realistic way.

Many of the witnesses told the committee of the difficulties they have had learning to read and write and of the problems of the illiterate in Canada. Many spoke of the severe difficulties faced by those with learning disabilities and other handicaps as they grow up and try to enter the labour market. It is frightening to read that the committee identifies illiteracy as the biggest single problem in Canada today. In his book Illiterate America, Jonathon Kozol estimates that one-third of all adults in the United States are not functionally literate. The Youth committee believes that there are four million Canadians in this category. Mr. Kozol states in his book, and I quote:

—that in broad terms, that means 60 million American adults are substantially excluded from the democratic process and the ordinary commerce of the print society.

This means that they cannot read the warning on a can of Drano, look up a telephone number, fill out a tax form or understand a lease. They are unequal before the law because they do not understand the law. It seems incredible that in many prosperous countries, the literacy levels rank below those of some Third World countries which we support with our foreign aid programs. According to one UNESCO study of illiteracy in Canada, 29 per cent of Canadian adults have achieved less than a grade nine education. If 29 per cent of the adult population had measles, I am sure we would declare this a national epidemic! It is important to note that, as stated in the report:

Many educators are finding that today's youth are reaching high school without the basic skills they should have acquired in the younger grades.

Also, it is important to realize that because a person has spent nine years in school, there is no guarantee he will have achieved a minimum of schooling at a grade nine level.

Who are the illiterate? According to Tracy Carpenter, Coordinator, Independent Studies Program, Frontier College of Toronto, they are the people who are disadvantaged in at least one way because of learning disabilities, mental or physical handicaps or other kinds of conflicts either with the law or their families. This "disadvantage" manifests itself immediately in the form of not being able to read or write.

It is a common perception that the illiterate are those who fall into the economically disadvantaged groups, but there is still a significant percentage of illiterates from the traditional middle-class environment, many of whom have high school diplomas. There is evidence to show that students from vocational schools are having a much higher incidence of accidents on the job because their reading skills are not adequate to allow them to read and understand safety regulations or operating manuals.

There are many causes of illiteracy, but one specific cause which contributes significantly—it is estimated to the extent of 15 to 20 per cent—is learning disabilities. What is the cost of learning disabilities to the lives of individuals and to the nation as a whole? The tragedy of illiteracy goes far beyond the lack of reading and writing skills. It affects a person's whole life.

Because of the high correlation of illiteracy with unemployment, poverty, substandard job performance, welfare and crime, estimates of the annual cost of illiteracy in the United States range from $100 billion to $220 billion. In the United States, studies indicate that 80 per cent of the prison population is illiterate. In Canada, the estimate of the prison population who are illiterate ranges from 40 per cent, according to the Nielsen task force report, to 80 per cent illiterate which is the figure for the United States. If we accept the fact that 15 to 20 per cent of our young adult population is learning disabled, then we must consider the possibility that a similar number of Canadians may not be gainfully employed or are employed in substandard jobs for that reason. Further, we should question just how many individuals who are welfare recipients are in fact also functionally illiterate and the relationship between the two.

The committee learned from the Canadian Association for Children and Adults with Learning Disabilities that learning disabled people have all the prerequisites for learning. They have average to above average intelligence. They are not blind or deaf. They are not emotionally disturbed. They simply cannot learn through traditional teaching techniques. Learning disabilities are not a new phenomenon. Historically, learning disabled people have always been part of our society but their specific needs often went undetected. They were the ones who dropped out of school and joined the ranks of the unemployed or underemployed. There were very few professionals who were able to recognize the symptoms of this invisible handicap, let alone know how to treat it. Most often, the learning disabled were thought to be lazy, retarded, immature or spoiled. In today's world, as we move away from the assembly lines and rapidly into the technological revolution of the Information Society, the difficulty of recognizing and treating the learning disabled has reached crisis proportions. School systems are caught in the dilemma of slowly responding to the demands of parents and advocates of learning disabled children to provide appropriate education programs for them. This is a monumental task because:

1. there is a need to identify children who are just beginning to encounter difficulties and, at the same time, deal with a huge backlog of students whose special needs have gone unrecognized for too long;
2. professionals, such as psychologists, medical practitioners and the teachers in the school systems do not have the knowledge and the expertise they require to properly identify the learning disabled as distinct from emotionally disturbed children. Therefore, in many special education classes, there is a mixture of differing special needs children who require different teaching approaches;

3. teachers do not have adequate knowledge and support in providing for learning disabled students in their regular classes or even in the special education classes.

It appears that not enough effort is being made to rectify these problems. According to David Cruickshank, a noted civil libertarian and Professor of Law, University of Calgary, special education programs are instituted at the discretion of school boards, and while some have established such programs, others have pretended that learning disabilities are not legitimate problems and have refused to help them. He maintains that this is a political problem which requires a political solution. This view was supported in the testimony to the Youth Committee of Ms. Judy Pelletier, representative of the Atlantic Conference on Learning Disabilities.

● (1610)

Dr. Melvine Levine, of the Harvard Medical School, in an address to the Alberta Association for Children and Adults with Learning Disabilities Conference in Calgary, 1984, stated:

we're paying a hefty price for not having identified and treated learning disabilities. We're paying in the form of increased insurance premiums and in the cost of maintaining jails, mental health institutions and drug and alcohol abuse treatment centres.

Ms. Nona Thompson, of Vancouver, who operates the Step-up Program for learning disabled young offenders, supports this view. She has found that once her students have experienced success in her program, very few of them ever break the law again.

Centres such as Foothills Academy in Calgary that have demonstrated expertise in identifying and assisting the learning disabled population, continue to operate in a difficult environment because of unresponsive governments' lack of funding and lack of school boards' co-operation. We need the political will to address the illiteracy issue on a realistic, concerted basis.

Programs such as those at Foothills Academy, have shown Canadians that, with proper intervention, learning disabled young people can succeed with their academic and social careers to become happy, productive and contributing members of our society. Early and appropriate assistance is not necessarily costly nor does it require a tremendous amount of advanced education.

What these programs do require are concerted efforts and recognition that illiteracy, and one of its leading causes, learning disabilities, do exist and that they can be rectified. This nation spends billions annually on incarceration, drug abuse programs, social welfare and unemployment assistance. These programs are only dealing with symptoms. It seems reasonable to me that our money might be better spent in a pro-active, rather than a reactive, manner.

Canadians are quick to claim that they care deeply about and recognize children as our most important resource. Lip service is not enough. A national strategy for assisting our young people must commence immediately. It is not enough to say that federal politics have little to do with provincial education matters. Illiteracy is a national crisis. Recognizing this crisis is a first step.

I would recommend as a second step, that the mandate of a national task force on co-ordination of educational qualifications, as recommended by the Youth Committee, pursue the following: 1. Establishment of (a) a national body of experts from each province to offer identification of regional centres of expertise in the education of learning disabled and/or illiterate youth; (b) strategies for co-operation between centres across the country to lead to a network of programs to meet more adequately the needs of Canadian youth; and 2. Establishment of federal incentives to the provinces to implement programs to address the educational and social needs of youth through the joint co-operation of the Departments of Health, Employment and Immigration, Justice and Youth, with the corresponding provincial departments, such as the Departments of Education and Advanced Education.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I put it to you that the youth of Canada cannot wait. We can no longer assume that the problems facing our youth today will be solved by solutions of yesterday. This country must be energetic and creative in its approach to the problems identified in the Youth Committee report and the important step of implementing the plan of action set out in the report should commence now.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Doody, for Senator David, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH AND TWENTY-NINTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE—ORDERS STAND

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Twenty-eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Banking, Trade and Commerce), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Consideration of the Twenty-ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Energy and Natural Resources), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, although I wish Orders Nos. 10 and 11 to stand, I want to give a little pré avis.

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration at its meeting when we approved these, asked that before their adoption I explain to the Senate that we are running out of funds for committee activity. On the basis of present approvals, let alone anticipated applications, our budget is just about exhausted.

There will be a meeting of the committee tomorrow and I want to take that opportunity to find out from the committee exactly what it is they want me to say and how much detail I should give.

I therefore request that Orders Nos. 10 and 11 stand.

Orders stand.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Thursday, May 1, 1986

The Senate met at 2 p.m. the Honourable Martial Asselin, P.C., Speaker pro tempore, in the Chair.

FINANCE

RESTRUCTURING OF FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS—SIXTEENTH REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the sixteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Murray, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF THIRTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE— DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the thirtieth report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am going to ask the Senate to take it into consideration now. May I have leave to do so?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With leave of the Senate, and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), it is moved by Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by Honourable Senator Petten, that this report be adopted now.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the report, which is quite short, reads as follows:

The Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration has the honour to present its Thirtieth Report.

Your Committee is presently undertaking a review of the budgetary situation pertaining to Senate Committees.

Notwithstanding the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operation of Senate Committees adopted on March 26, 1986, your Committee recommends the following:

That, for any Committee budget for the financial year 1986-87 submitted to and approved by the Internal Economy Committee, your Committee be authorized to release no more than 3/12 of those approved funds until the end of June 1986.

Honourable senators, this question came up at a meeting of the Internal Economy Committee this morning. This report is prompted by the fact that we have to review the amount of budget provided for committee work in light of budgets presently submitted and, in some cases, approved budgets and anticipated budgets that we expect to be filed very shortly. We shall have some difficulty with future budgets until we have had a full review, which we propose to have, both within the committee and with committee chairmen. In the meantime, some committee budgets have been approved and, as a result, expenditures are being made or are required to be made. Therefore, the suggestion is that when they have been approved by the Internal Economy Committee, though not yet approved by the Senate—because I do not want to ask for approval for some of these other budgets until the review has taken place—the administration be authorized to release funds for the three-month period ending in June.

Hon. Lowell Murray: May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Opposition whether the intention is to be completely rigid in the application of that suggested formula? In the absence of the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, I find myself speaking on his behalf with regard to a budget that he has placed before the Internal Economy Committee concerning the sending of a delegation to Washington, New York and Toronto in connection with our study of the international debt problem. I am not sure that three-twelfths of whatever budget he submitted would cover that expense which will be incurred within the next 30 days or so.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration did not ignore the point raised by Senator Murray. In fact, I have already drafted a letter, as requested by the committee, to all of the chairmen of committees urging them to bring forward their budgets as soon as possible so that we can deal with them. I might say that the particular committee mentioned by Senator Murray has not presented a budget, and I am encouraging them to do so as soon as possible. We will then need to look at the question of whether or not the proposed visit to Washington, New York and Toronto will be covered by the three-twelfths portion in that context.

Senator Murray: I might say that the Foreign Affairs Committee has had a budget before it, and unless I am seriously mistaken, we approved the budget the other day. However, there may be a failure in communication, or some delay in getting copies to my friend, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the chairman of the committee told me earlier this week that he was in the process of establishing a budget and having it approved by the committee, but it has not yet come to the Internal Economy Committee. Honourable senators, those are the reasons for the report, and I ask honourable senators to adopt it now so that that interim program can take effect.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I am not so sure that we should adopt this report so quickly. I am not the chairman of any committee, but there could be some chairmen who are not here today and who might possibly like to look at this report. One gets the impression that perhaps the Internal Economy Committee is putting this report through without giving proper notice, and I think that they can wait until Tuesday next. Therefore I propose that we wait until Tuesday next before adopting this report.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, the Internal Economy Committee has no trouble with that suggestion. We can wait for weeks. I am asking that this report be adopted now, not for the sake of the Internal Economy Committee, but for the sake of the chairmen of the committees that are the concern of Senator Bonnell. The purpose of the exercise is so that they can have their expenditures authorized. If we put the matter off, it means that in the meantime they cannot make any expenditures.

However, I want to make it clear that the Internal Economy Committee itself is not in any hurry, if the Senate wishes to take more time. The reason I am asking for the report to be adopted now is so that those committees that have had their budgets approved can get some funds. Therefore it is the chairmen of the committees I am concerned about, not the Internal Economy Committee.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Senator Bonnell, is it your wish to adjourn the debate?

Senator Bonnell: I move the adjournment of this debate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Bonnell, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau, that debate on the motion be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

[Senator Frith.]

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Senator McElman: Nay!

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is the motion adopted, on division?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is a question of whether we should have a vote on the matter or just simply state that it is adjourned on division. It is entirely up to the Senate. In other words, the only question is the adjournment. It is a question of whether or not Senator McElman wants a vote since he raised the question with his "nay" vote.

Senator Bonnell: I think it would take more than one "nay".

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think it is appropriate to make a comment on the proposal that the adjournment be agreed to. I would be reluctant to see the Senate oppose this motion, because it has been our custom to grant willingly adjournments of debates, even if sometimes it seems a little awkward to some of us. I would hope that we would allow the adjournment motion to be put without a division, or certainly without a standing vote.

• (1410)

Senator Frith: Agreed.

Senator McElman: It is my vote that it is now in question. I wanted to register my vote against the motion by Senator Bonnell, because he has clearly shown the Senate that the reason for his motion is the wrong reason, as explained by Senator Frith. I was trying to assist him, but apparently he does not need assistance.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday next, 6th May, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CABINET

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST GUIDELINES—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. Yesterday I asked certain questions concerning the conflict-of-interest guidelines and the material that was sent out by the Prime Minister to ministers and others holding public office.

I have one further quotation that I should like to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government. It is taken from the conflict-of-interest document that was made public in September 1985. It is principle 7(a) on page 3 of the document. I shall omit a few words, but it reads as follows:

7. Every public office holder shall conform to the following principles:

(a) public office holders shall . . . so arrange their private affairs in such a manner that public confidence and trust in the integrity, objectivity and impartiality of government are conserved and enhanced;

Honourable senators, yesterday the Prime Minister made the following statement, as reported in today's Globe and Mail:

We don't axe people or their wives or their children based on unfounded speculation in newspapers.

My question is: In view of the public concern, will the government leader say whether it is the view of the government—or will he undertake to bring it to the attention of the government—that this whole question should be referred to a committee, where the facts can be established without controversy?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the quotation read by my honourable friend from the guidelines issued some time ago indicates the basis on which the conflict-of-interest compliance measures were to be framed. Working on the basis of those principles, compliance measures were framed and have been put into effect; and we believe that the minister in question is in compliance with those compliance measures.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, may I repeat the question, to see whether I can get an answer to the point that I have raised? The public generally, and business people in particular, are under considerable pressure as to whether, in the public view, their actions are such that would merit the confidence of the public generally. But here is a public servant, a person holding public office—namely, the honourable the minister—of whom the press and others have raised the question of integrity, and whether, in the view of the public generally, the position held is being enhanced.

I am asking whether the government is prepared, and if the honourable minister in this chamber is prepared to recommend to the government, to have this matter considered by a committee so that this issue can be put to rest and so that that confidence can be enhanced.

Senator Roblin: No, I am not, honourable senators.

CANADIAN ARSENALS LIMITED DIVESTITURE AUTHORIZATION BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the third reading of Bill C-87, to authorize the divestiture of Canadian Arsenals Limited and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, there was one question arising out of the remarks which Senator Kelly made on his motion for second reading of this bill which I intended to comment upon and to question, but which I neglected to do in my remarks on second reading.

He stated, I believe, that the proceeds of the divestiture, or sale, of Canadian Arsenals Limited, would be placed in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada and would, therefore, go to reduce the current deficit or the contemplated deficit for the fiscal year 1986-87.

I am sure that his facts were right, but the question which occurs to me is as follows: Was not Canada's interest in and holdings in Canadian Arsenals Limited shown as an asset of the Government of Canada in the Public Accounts of Canada, and why, therefore, should not the proceeds of the sale of Canadian Arsenals Limited be placed against that asset, and hence diminish the capital, and not the current indebtedness of the Government of Canada? It seems to me that if we are going to sell off all of our crown corporations and put the proceeds into a current account only, we are diminishing the assets of the Government of Canada in a way we ought not to do.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is there an answer, Senator Kelly?

Senator Kelly: I didn't understand. Is that a question, Senator Hicks? I wasn't sure.

Senator Hicks: I would welcome your comment, if you have it, but I am quite prepared to put my remarks on the record anyway. But, if you can say anything in elucidation of it, I would welcome listening to your views, sir.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, I agree with the logic that has been offered in Senator Hicks' remarks. He is totally correct. The fact is that the government, for as far back as anyone can discover, has never accounted for capital assets in the way we are accustomed to it in business.

As I mentioned yesterday, the value of Canadian Arsenals Limited on the books of the country, the Public Accounts of Canada, is listed as $4.7 million, which is merely the amount of money owing by Canadian Arsenals Limited to the Government of Canada. The book value, the balance sheet—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What is that? Is that secured by debenture or something of that kind, or is it just an indebtedness?

Senator Kelly: I gather it is probably nothing more than some form of note.

The government operates its books on a cash basis. CAL, on the other hand, carries a book value of $50 million which, in your terms and mine, should normally appear in that form on the balance sheet of the Government of Canada, but it does not. This is a problem that has been raised many times by Mr. Dye, most recently, and by previous auditors general, namely that perhaps the state of the business, the state of the country, could be much better described if they did get into what I would consider more conventional balance sheet accounting. But the fact is they do not. That is why I said yesterday that that total selling price, the $92 million plus a little will go directly to the Consolidated Revenue Fund and will be offset only to the extent of the $4.7 million shown as owing. The rest, in the system of their accounts, will flow through to reduce the budgetary deficit for the year. I agree that your logic is mine.

● (1420)

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, there seems to be very little disagreement between Senator Kelly and myself and I certainly did not put forth this inquiry or express this view with any intention of delaying the passage of the bill.

I cannot say that I am satisfied with his explanation, but I am satisfied that he is correct in what he has said and I have no further comments to make.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I should like to ask Senator Kelly a question flowing from his answer.

When he said that the Auditor General and other auditors general had raised this question, does that relate to this recent program, plan or suggestion developed by the Auditor General in Canada and his counterpart in Washington, copies of which we received, trying to put the accounts of the government on a balance sheet basis that would be more readable? Was he referring also to that document?

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, the answer to the question is: Yes, to an extent that is dealt with in that document.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. Douglas D. Everett: Honourable senators, may I have leave to make a few remarks regarding this bill? Then the debate could be adjourned again in Senator Godfrey's name. Incidentally, Senator Godfrey has agreed to proceeding in this way.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Everett: Honourable senators, as you will likely know, this order concerns Bill S-8, a bill introduced by Senator Haidasz, seconded by Senator Bosa and which, if it were made law, would prohibit smoking in a number of areas controlled by the federal government.

This short bill, in clause 2 states:

(1) No person shall smoke in any indoor place of work provided by

(a) the Senate or the House of Commons;

(b) the government of Canada; or

(c) a federal work, undertaking or business within the meaning of the Canada Labour Code.

The bill in clause 4, states:

(1) No person shall smoke in

(a) an aircraft operated pursuant to a licence issued under Part II of the Aeronautics Act;

(b) a ship registered under the Canada Shipping Act;

(c) a railway car operated by a company to which the Railway Act applies; or

(d) a motor vehicle operated pursuant to a licence issued by a provincial transport board under the authority of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act . . .

This creates a global prohibition of smoking in any work area indoors, which would include the Senate, the House of Commons, any building owned by the Government of Canada, any federal work undertaken by the Government of Canada or any business that comes under the jurisdiction of the Government of Canada. It would include, for example, all banks. It also proposes to prohibit smoking indoors and on board any aircraft, any ship, in any railway car and any motor vehicles—presumably those involved in interprovincial trade.

Honourable senators, I agree with Senator Flynn that this is a very bad bill. No matter where you stand on the subject of smoking—and undoubtedly some may be against it—I do not see how any reasonable person could be in favour of this kind of global regulation. As far as I can tell, it would mean that if someone were in his office, he would not be allowed to smoke. If someone were on a train, as Senator Flynn has pointed out, he would not be allowed to retire to his own private car to smoke. If he were on a ship, he would not be able to go to his stateroom and smoke. If he were a member or employee of a bank, he, again, could not go into his own office and smoke. This is not a case of trying to protect people in public places from smokers and transferred smoke—it is a case of totally prohibiting an individual act, even if that act is done in such a way that it does not harm other people. The idea of this bill is that it would prohibit such an act entirely.

Honourable senators, I can understand people being against smoking; I do not smoke, myself. But I fail to understand how anyone could become so fanatic about this whole thing that he would put into operation a law that would totally prohibit reasonable smoking by people who are damn fool enough to do it.

Senator Frith has said that we should give the bill second reading and send it to a committee for improvement. Well, I really do not think that that is possible. If we were to give this bill second reading, then we would have approved the principle that throughout those areas controlled by the Government of Canada smoking would be absolutely banned and prohibited. I do not think the bill could then go to a committee, only to have its members say, "Well, we have changed our minds on this whole thing. We think that perhaps the prohibition should not be quite so global." I just do not think that would be feasible.

Senator Godfrey has come up with a rather interesting and worthwhile approach to the subject, which I think he will discuss when he speaks to this motion, and that is that the substance of the bill be referred to committee for examination before a vote is taken on second reading. That may, indeed, be worthwhile, although I would rather see this bill withdrawn by Senator Haidasz and re-introduced with its terms formulated on a much more reasonable basis. I could certainly support the concept that there should be a prohibition on smoking in public places throughout government, but I am afraid that I just could not possibly support the idea that in a private office smoking should be banned and prohibited. I do not even know how such legislation could be policed.

With all due respect to Senator Haidasz—and I know he mentioned that the law officer of the Senate helped him to draft this bill—I think that it is a very badly drafted bill and that it should be redrafted before it goes any further. I read Senator Haidasz's speech and he gives some devastating figures on how smoke affects people's health. Many of those statistics are related to the effect on the health of those who smoke, which is understandable. An awful lot of them are related to the effects of transferred smoke; that is, smoke that is transferred from people who smoke to people who do not smoke. I suppose it could be maintained that those facts given by Senator Haidasz are correct and beyond argument. But I am not sure that that is necessarily true. I am not disagreeing with them. But, in recent history a lot of claims based on statistics have been accepted without anybody doing any real research on the subject. It may be that transferred smoke is as dangerous as Senator Haidasz says it is, but it may also be that it is not. I would like to see some evidence to support the fact that it is as dangerous as he says it is.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, let me give you an example. As you all know, a couple of days ago, there was a nuclear disaster in the Soviet Union. The Russians claimed that two people were killed. It is my understanding that some reporters contacted some experts in the West and were told by these experts that it would be impossible for such an explosion to result in the deaths of only two people. They were told that it would be more likely that 2,000 people would be killed. So far as I know, there was no proof that 2,000, 1,000 or 500 people were killed, no proof at all. It was mere speculation by experts that in such an explosion where there was a melt-down involving a graphite core, it was more likely that 2,000 people would be killed. I refer honourable senators to yesterday's Toronto Sun where we read the headline, "Two Thousand People Killed in Nuclear Explosion." By that headline, the assertion has become accepted fact. Anybody who reads that headline will accept it as fact. So, people can make the assertion that transferred smoke is dangerous and is more of a killer than the effect of direct smoke on people who are themselves smokers, but such statements should be examined very carefully.

I can understand this bill's being amended to make it far less prohibitive and to make its provisions more directly related to the effects of smoking in public places. I can understand referring the subject matter of the bill to a committee for examination and to ascertain how serious the matter is. But I really cannot support the idea of a bill of this nature.

In the final paragraphs of the bill there are some global prohibitions, after which it says that the Governor in Council, advised by the Minister of Labour, or by the Minister of Transport, as the case may be, may make recommendations which, in effect, would reduce the effect of the act. That is not good draftsmanship. It is not good draftsmanship to legislate a global prohibition and then to say that the effect of it can be softened by regulation.

I believe, with respect, Senator Haidasz, that the bill should be withdrawn, that it should be reconstructed on the basis that the prohibition refers to public places and that it is not a general prohibition.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Sinclair).

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have looked at this order, and I note that it is a debate on the consideration of the eighth report of the standing committee. I think it is important, having in mind what I have to say later, that it is in that light that we look at this report.

At the outset, I wish to go on record as complimenting Senator Molson on the initiative he took with regard to this report and the active way in which he dealt with it. This film as we have seen it, and the evidence in connection with its production which was received by the committee, does not need to be reviewed by me at this time. Some of it is on the record. The Honourable Senator Perrault has gone through the shooting script that was used in the production of the film and has brought to the attention of honourable senators numerous instances of inaccuracies and misconceptions.

My difficulty is with the fact that this film was developed as a full-length documentary film. I do not pretend to have any great feeling for the nuances of the arts or for the designations that some of those esoteric people who live in that community sometimes use, but I do think I know what is meant by a "document" and I also think I know what most people think a "document" is supposed to tell you. When a document is referred to, it requires anybody dealing with it to deal with it accurately, to deal with it in an open-handed and even-handed way and not to use it for some purpose or to convey something other than that which the document was intended to convey.

If this was to be a document that dealt with Billy Bishop, it certainly failed to do so in an accurate way. It failed to do so in an open-handed and even-handed way, and it failed to do so in a balanced way. Nobody who looks at the evidence could come to any other conclusion. Not only is that the case but the head of the National Film Board, Mr. Macerola, said, "in our minds it was released and conceived as a docu-drama." Now, let me say that I am not at all clear on what a docu-drama is, but if it was conceived in his mind from the very outset as a docu-drama, why did he not designate the film as such when it was released? Why does he feel now that it is necessary to change the designation of the film? This, in my view, leads to only one conclusion and that is that the National Film Board admits that it made a mistake.

[Senator Everett.]

Surely, they are not the first people to make a mistake and there is not always something terribly wrong about making mistakes. The real wrong comes about when nothing is done about them once they are brought to light. It has been brought forcibly to the attention of the National Film Board that they made a mistake with regard to this film. This has nothing to do with censorship, in my opinion. People who argue that in its activities in dealing with this film the Senate is embarking upon censorship are not addressing the true situation. The true situation is that, having made a mistake and having acknowledged that they made a mistake, they should take action to correct it. To do this, they should recall the film, re-edit it and change it in very material respects. In this way, they will be able to rectify their mistakes and they will be able to deal with the matter in a fair and even-handed manner. I urge the Senate as forcefully as I can that in considering this report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs they express the view that the recommendation of the committee does not go far enough, that it should go further and request, forcefully, that the National Film Board correct this mistake, recall the film and re-edit it appropriately.

● (1440)

I say this because the National Film Board is in a very unusual position. It is a public-funded body and it carries with it, I hope, the integrity of a well-established and well-run institution. It has had that reputation in the past, and it would be most unfortunate if the view that is held by many as to the very high standard that the National Film Board has adopted and the good reputation it has earned in the past were to be sullied by this mistake. I suggest, honourable senators, that the Senate take the appropriate action to bring about a correction of that very unfortunate mistake and thereby assist in maintaining the reputation of the National Film Board for the future.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

"(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees."—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this motion has been before us for some time now and has been referred to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders to make sure that the form is correct. Since it is a motion, if I were to speak to its substance rather than merely making these comments—which may be treated as speaking to it—then I would be closing the debate.

So, unless someone else wishes to speak to it, I see no reason why we should not put the question.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Before that is done, perhaps someone could explain to me why this motion is limited to the Senate committee rooms. What about the Senate chamber?

Senator Frith: That question was raised before the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders and the committee did consider it. There is no reason why we cannot add that wording. The justification for not including it is the citations in Beauchesne which said that smoking had never been permitted in the Senate and that the tradition was well established that there should be no smoking in the Senate chamber. That may or may not be a satisfactory explanation, but I have no objection to the chamber's being included in the wording of the rule. However, because the tradition is so well established and because of the shared feeling that the Leader of the Government and I have on the question of not imposing a rule unless it is necessary, I think that the motion should go forward in the way it is worded.

Senator Roblin: There is just the slight matter of inconsistency.

Senator Frith: There is no question about the inconsistency. However, I think that same point could be raised to support a lot of rules that would be additional to our present rules. I admit that the one is based on tradition; the other is based on a specific rule. There is just no tradition to support the prohibition on smoking in the committee rooms.

Senator Roblin: I see no reason why it cannot be amended.

Senator Frith: In that event, let's amend it right now.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I think for clarification, I will move the adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH AND TWENTY-NINTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE—ORDERS STAND

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Twenty-eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Banking, Trade and Commerce), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Consideration of the Twenty-ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Energy and Natural Resources), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Orders Nos. 10 and 11 should stand, in view of the provisions of the report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration that I referred to earlier.

Orders stand.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONSIDERATION OF FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we have no report from the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration regarding the budget covering this item. Therefore, under our new procedures it should stand.

Order stands.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO PERMIT COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL WITHDRAWN

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Gigantès, seconded by the Honourable Senator Lapointe, P.C.:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, which was authorized by the Senate on October 29, 1985, to study and report upon the Consultation Paper on Training, and the document entitled: "Employment Opportunities: Preparing Canadians for a Better Future", or any sub-committee so authorized by the Committee, be empowered to adjourn from place to place within and outside Canada for the purpose of such study.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order—I do not know if that is the right expression to use.

[Translation]

Considering that we adopted a new rule yesterday about the procedure to be followed with respect to the budgets and expenditures of committees or subcommittees, I have the impression that the motion introduced by Senator Gigantès is no longer needed because, as I recall, the report on the same subject has been adopted.

So how should we proceed? With leave of the Senate, do we simply withdraw this item from the order paper?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee responsible for studying this matter is satisfied that this motion is similar in nature to the one we adopted yesterday, so perhaps we might consider this one as having been debated.

[English]

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators, that the motion be withdrawn?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: The only problem is that, in that event, we must assume that Senator Gigantès has agreed, because he is the one who moved the motion.

[Translation]

Senator Tremblay: We have discussed this together. It had been agreed that, after the adoption of the report yesterday, Senator Gigantès would move that his motion be withdrawn. But yesterday certain circumstances forced Senator Gigantès to leave the Senate in a hurry, therefore he was unable to move his withdrawal motion. By suggesting on his behalf that the motion be withdrawn, since it was the subject of a positive decision yesterday, I think I am expressing his own feeling.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourables sénateurs, since Senator Tremblay is vouching for Senator Gigantès' intentions, I think we can decide that the motion is withdrawn. Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

NATIONAL POSTAL MUSEUM

ADVISORY COMMITTEE—MOTION FOR RETURN ADOPTED

Hon. Henry D. Hicks, pursuant to notice of April 29, 1986, moved:

That there be laid before this House a return showing the names, addresses and dates of appointment of those persons who are presently members of the Advisory Committee of the National Postal Museum.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain. Are we not to get an explanation?

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, the Advisory Committee to the National Postal Museum has been a body that, when the museum was founded nearly 15 years ago, enjoyed the respect of philatelists throughout the country. During the past few years, most of those persons on the Advisory Committee who had any knowledge of philately, or who were recognized in Canada as having any knowledge of philately, have been replaced on the committee by persons not known to the philatelic community. For that reason I wanted an update of the present composition of the committee. I received a letter from the minister's office, signed by an executive assistant—incredible though that seems—saying that it was not the policy of the government to disclose the names of the persons who were appointed to the committee.

I realize that the minister in charge of the Canada Post Corporation, the Honourable Michel Côté, is a new and inexperienced minister, but I was not prepared to let him get away with the flat denial of this kind of information to—I was going to say to the Senate of Canada, but I will say to a Canadian citizen who wrote and asked for that information. Therefore I have placed this order on the order paper, hoping that I may find out what sort of persons are advising the Canada Post Corporation about the National Postal Museum.

An Hon. Senator: Very good.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: I wonder whether the honourable senator could extend his inquiry to include the sort of people who are advising the minister in connection with the information he provides.

Senator Hicks: Honourable senators, I think that does not come within my province.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

At 5.30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Gerald E. Le Dain, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned, and being come with their Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bill:

An Act to authorize the divestiture of Canadian Arsenals Limited and to amend other Acts in consequence thereof (Bill C-87, Chapter 20, 1986)

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 6, 1986, at 2 p.m.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the Ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders respecting a message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to their Standing Orders. Honourable senators, I ask that it be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. .)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I propose that we do that tomorrow. I urge honourable senators to read the report and, in particular, the section relative to the establishment of the new Committee on Parliament, which replaces some previous joint committees. This has been the subject of a rather lengthy debate in the committee and it represents an important change. The House of Commons is anxious that we proceed in this matter, so I urge honourable senators to read the report and I suggest that we proceed with the consideration of the report tomorrow.

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTINGS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Lowell Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized by the Senate on April 17, 1986 to examine the subject-matter of the Bill C-91, intituled: "An Act to establish the Competition Tribunal and to amend the Combines Investigation Act and the Bank Act and other Acts in consequence thereof", in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto, have the power to sit at three thirty o'clock in the afternoon on Wednesdays for the duration of the above-mentioned study, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

RIGHTS AND FREEDOMS

CANADIAN FORCES—SPOUSES OF MEMBERS—COMMITTEE ACTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the chairman of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence. On March 25, 1986, the Senate referred to that committee the consideration of the rights of military wives to engage in certain activities. The matter was referred to the committee by way of a motion, and I wondered if the chairman of the committee could now report whether the committee has held any hearings, heard any witnesses or, generally, has taken any action to deal with that reference.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, the motion was indeed referred to our committee on March 25. I apologize for not being present in the Senate on that day, as I had to attend the funeral of a close friend of 60 years' standing; otherwise I might have asked some questions at that time.

The referral was made to the committee, as I interpreted the debate, conditionally and in a rather ambiguous fashion. The honourable senator said:

I suggest that we do refer it to the Committee on National Defence with it being understood that they are not going to deal with it, or at least that they are going to be asking the minister perhaps to appear there when he is ready to make a statement,—

That I have done. The minister is quite ready to appear when he makes his statement. He has told us that since he made the commitment to issue a statement before the other place, he would like to make that statement before appearing before our committee—which, I believe, is an entirely legitimate request.

The minister had planned to issue the statement, according to information that I have, on or about April 11, after the House of Commons had returned from the Easter recess; but within the department there was not complete agreement as to the substance of the statement, and it went back to the drawing board. According to the information I have received, the statement has now been completed. It was to be considered by cabinet some time this week, and is expected to be issued some time next week. So under the circumstances, and since the wording of the motion spells out the subject under consideration, I believe we should wait to hear from the minister and the department first. Having reached this point, I believe we should wait until we see what develops next week.

● (1405)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that is an entirely acceptable answer to the question. Clearly, it would be advisable to have the committee deal with the question and call any witnesses it might want to call in addition to the minister after the statement is made. In that way we could use the statement, more or less, as a guideline for the committee's deliberations. However, I would also ask of the chairman that he take up with his steering committee the possibility, at least, of calling some witnesses before the statement is made. Perhaps it will encourage the minister to make the statement in due course or, at least, more promptly. Certainly, if the intention is to make the statement this week or next week, there is no need to do so, but if the delay appears to be continuing, I wonder whether the chairman would consider hearing some witnesses prior to the statement's being made.

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, I have no indication that the minister needs prompting in this respect, and I have no indication that there should be with respect to this question the type of procrastination that perhaps the Department of National Defence is guilty of in other respects.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I thank the chairman for his answer. I shall let it sink in for a moment and, if it appears to be necessary, I shall renew my questions on the subject.

Senator Marshall: That is the best thing we have accomplished in a month.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have two delayed answers.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, the first delayed answer is in reply to the Honourable Senator Bonnell, who made some inquiries about the Litton Systems contract that is now in the course of negotiation.

(The answer follows:)

[Senator Lafond.]

In April 1986, the Hon. Harvie Andre, Associate Minister of National Defence announced that the government would begin negotiations with Oerlikon-Bührle Machine Tool Works of Switzerland and Litton Systems Canada, on arrangements for supplying a Low Level Air Defence System to the Canadian Forces. No contract has been signed.

Negotiations with the consortium will seek to ensure that the project can be accommodated within Defence spending allocations set out in the Government's fiscal framework for 1986-87—1991-91 and beyond.

The proposal submitted by Oerlikon-Bührle and Litton was found to be the best, based on selection criteria such as effectiveness, cost and socio-economic benefits.

HUMAN RIGHTS

ABSENCE OF SENATORS FROM MEMBERSHIP OF OBSERVER GROUP AT BERNE MEETING

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a reply to a question asked by the Honourable Senator Haidasz, who inquired on April 23 last about the reasons why no senators were included in the delegation to the Berne meeting.

(The answer follows:)

In accordance with his decision to include parliamentary observers in the Canadian delegation, the Secretary of State for External Affairs wrote to the leaders of the two opposition parties on March 11 last and asked them to designate a representative from each of their parties respectively to attend the conference.

Honourable members will appreciate that, unlike the Ottawa meeting where travel and accommodation costs for Canadian delegates were not an inhibiting factor, we were unable to accommodate all parliamentarians interested in attending. Each party was invited to send one representative.

In the case of the Liberal party and in light of Senator Haidasz's well-known interest in the Helsinki process, the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his correspondence with the Leader of the Liberal Party, noted the interest of Senator Haidasz in attending and, further, indicated that in responding to the invitation of the SSEA to name a representative of the Liberal Party, the Leader of the Official Opposition was free to name a senator.

The Right Honourable Leader of the Opposition did not name Senator Haidasz as the representative of his party at the Berne CSCE meeting. Instead, he referred the matter over to his Chief Opposition Whip, who provided us with three names from which to choose a Liberal representative. All were Liberal members of the House of Commons. Ultimately, after consultation with Mr. Gauthier's office, Sheila Copps was chosen.

Senator Haidasz will of course be familiar with this information since it was relayed to him by telephone by a staff member of the SSEA.

In addition last week this same information was also provided to the Honourable Senator MacEachen's office at their request.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, yesterday happened to be the twenty-ninth anniversary of the day I gave up smoking. Before that I was a three-package-per-day man. I only mention that fact to indicate that I have a certain amount of prejudice on this subject. I can recall that when I was smoking three packages a day I would get on some modes of public transportation—subways, buses, streetcars or whatever—and had no craving for a cigarette, because I knew I could not smoke. However, if a friend happened to pick me up while I was waiting for the bus, and I knew that I could smoke in his car but did not have any cigarettes, I would nearly go crazy. I think this point has some relevance, particularly having regard to the recent action taken by Air Canada and the rather ridiculous reaction of Imasco to it. In all logic, if Imasco intends to advise their employees not to fly Air Canada, they should also advise them not to go to church, because services usually last for more than an hour. They should also advise them not to use public transportation in cities such as Toronto and Montreal because, again, the same principle applies.

● (1410)

However, today I do not wish to confine myself to discussing the merits of this particular motion. What I really want to discuss is the procedure that I think we should adopt. Senator Frith referred to the fact that, back in 1947, the then Speaker made a ruling that you could not refer the subject matter of a bill to committee before second reading. I have looked up the Debates of the Senate for that day, which was March 27, 1947, and I would like to read an extract from the speech of Senator Hayden on the matter, which I think is just as relevant today, 39 years later, as it was then. It also refers to the ruling of the Speaker. He said:

I also appreciate the position of those who are hesitant about giving this measure second reading and sending it to committee. They do not want to commit themselves at this time to the principle of the bill.

I recall that last year while dealing with the Foreign Exchange Control Bill, we adopted a practice that might be again followed in this instance. At that time a motion was made that the bill be not now read a second time, but that the subject-matter of the bill be referred to committee for consideration and report. After some consideration of that procedure I have come to the conclusion that it might be the solution to the present difficulties. Therefore at this time I move, seconded by the honourable senator from Gloucester (Hon. Mr. Veniot):

That this bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce for consideration and report.

By adopting this motion honourable senators will have an opportunity, without committing themselves to the principle of the bill, to hear evidence in committee from the consuming public of Canada, organized and otherwise, as they wish to appear, and from the organized dairy industry. We shall also have a chance to consider the draft report and convention of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment. All that material will be before us in committee; and, I repeat, we shall be able to give consideration to it without having committed ourselves to the principle of the bill.

Later on, the Speaker made a ruling, and I will only read part of it at this time. He said:

—according to our rules and the rules of the House of Commons the only amendments which can be made are those of a delaying or obstructive character. I rule against this motion. I believe it would be unwise to adopt the practice. One can easily see that it would provide an easy method of bringing about filibustering in matters of parliamentary procedure; and that is the reason, I believe, why it has never been admitted either in the House of Commons or the Senate.

I would make one comment. It is true that a motion referring a bill to a committee before receiving second reading was an established way of disposing of and blocking the bill. However, to get around that, if a motion included the wording "and report back to the chamber," then you are not obstructing; you are instructing them to consider and report back.

In making that statement about the fact that that practice had never been admitted in the House of Commons or the Senate, the Speaker was not strictly correct, and I would like to refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Orders, fifth edition, published in 1978. On page 227, at paragraph 748, it says:

(1) On the motion for the second reading of a bill amending the Canada Grain Act and a proposed amendment that the subject matter be referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Colonization, the Speaker—

And here they are referring to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

—ruled the proposed amendment out of order on the grounds that the Committee had not yet been appointed.

The date of that ruling was February 10, 1947, which was prior to the ruling that the Speaker of the Senate had made, to which I have just referred.

Later on, the same paragraph reads as follows:

(3) An amendment cannot propose the reference of the subject-matter of a bill to a body which is not in existence.

The reference there is to the Journals, January 21, 1971. Therefore I do not think that the Speaker of the Senate at that time was strictly correct, and was probably unaware of the reason for the ruling of the Speaker of the House of Commons several months before, which was based on the fact that the committee did not exist.

In 1947 the practice of referring the subject matter of a bill to a committee had not been adopted. I think it was around 1961 that Senator Hayden first started to use that procedure for the then Standing Senate Committee on Banking and Commerce. It came to be used more frequently after that, and I know that over the past few years most committees of the Senate have used that procedure, particularly to avoid what has been called the "Christmas closure." The Senate used to complain about receiving bills at the last minute, so we arranged that method of pre-study so that we were not caught short.

● (1415)

In logic there is no reason why a committee—if a bill can be pre-studied before it even comes before the Senate—should not be able to conduct a pre-study of a bill after it has received first reading.

I should like to refer to Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, page 226. I should point out that this was published in 1978. At that page, under citation 746, the following appears:

(1) An amendment, urging a committee to consider the subject-matter of a bill, might be moved and carried if the House were adverse to giving the bill itself a second reading and so conceding its principle. But where further information is desired in direct relation to the terms of the bill before the House, the advantage of referring the bill to a committee could be explained in the second reading stage.

(2) The amendment may seek further information in relation to the bill by either committee, the production of papers or other evidence.

So, as far as Beauchesne is concerned, it is perfectly proper to refer a bill to a committee for pre-study after first reading.

I should like to refer to specific instances when a matter such as this came before the Senate. The first relates to the Income Tax Act. At page 1617 of Debates of the Senate the Honourable Royce Frith stated:

Honourable senators, the bill that has just been read the first time will not, of course, be available for study by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee until it has received second reading. However, it has been our practice when dealing with complicated legislation, consistent with the parliamentary tradition that Senate committees give particularly careful consideration to such measures, to refer the subject matter to a committee in advance.

He then moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine and consider the subject matter of the Bill C-54, intituled: "An Act to amend the statute law relating to income tax", or any matter relating thereto.

At that time there was no requirement that the bill be reported back to the Senate because it had already received first reading. This was to save time during the second reading debate, and it was to be considered, I presume, that when the debate was concluded the bill would be formally referred to the committee, but the committee would already have saved some time.

The next act I should like to refer to is the Holidays Act. In Debates of the Senate of August 4, 1982, the Honourable Senator Frith stated:

There is no question that such a referral can be made with the unanimous consent of the house, as is the case with Bill C-201, but I feel I should point out for future reference that there is some question whether such a motion is otherwise in order, because at page 231 of the Debates of the Senate for March 27, 1947, the Speaker made a ruling holding that such a motion was out of order. I discussed that point with Senator Flynn, who pointed out that he had found precedents indicating the contrary.

Later Senator Flynn said:

Honourable senators, I believe Senator Frith raised this point only as a means of preserving his right to raise an objection with respect to some other matter on some future occasion. Bearing that in mind, I should like to draw to the attention of His Honour the Speaker, and of the Senate generally, that citation 668 of Beauchesne's is applicable. I mention that for future reference.

I looked up citation 668 and it had no reference to this particular problem. I think what Senator Flynn really meant was citation 746, which I have just read.

● (1420)

On that occasion I intervened to say that I thoroughly agreed with the principle—on certain occasions, it does not happen too often—of referring a bill to a committee before it has received second reading.

I also referred to the fact that it was a private members' bill of Mr. Caccia in connection with the starting of the Solar Research Council that went through the House of Commons and came to the Senate. The bill was subject to the same criticisms as this particular bill: It was poorly drafted, and I moved that it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce before it had second reading.

There was a debate on my motion and at no time during that debate did anyone raise the question of whether or not it was proper to do so under our rules. In the end, my motion got voted down by a narrow margin.

The bill then went to the committee where the committee killed it; they did not even bother with it because it was so faulty. I thought at that time, by the action that I had taken, that we had established a precedent in the house that you did not need unanimous consent. No one raised the question at the time. There was an actual vote and we considered the matter on the merits.

The last reference I would like to make to is to the Corporate Shareholding Limitation Bill. I refer to the Debates of the Senate of November 8, 1982, where Senator Flynn said:

In any case, I suggest that the proper procedure at this stage would be for the subject matter of the bill to be referred to a committee before the Senate is called upon to deal with it on second reading.

I do not know whether the Leader of the Government agrees with this proposal? If so, I could let him move the motion himself. If not, I would move it myself.

I do not feel we should be asked to vote on the principle of this bill on second reading now before we are given some explanation.

Senator Olson said:

It is really a point of order. I think we could agree to refer the subject matter of the bill to a committee.

Later on Senator Olson said:

I understand that, but if the honourable senator wants more of an explanation of the bill, it seems to me that it would probably take no more time to refer the subject matter—if the honourable senator would so agree—to the proper committee, that being the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Senator Olson later said:

If it is a very narrow point concerning constitutional affairs only, then the bill should go to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Later on Senator Olson said:

—we will support the motion as it is moved by the Leader of the Opposition. I wonder if he is also prepared to give us an indication that the subject matter would be limited in that committee to the constitutional matter?

Senator Flynn replied:

It would be up to the committee. As to the technical aspects of the bill, whether or not the committee deals with them does not present a problem.

As honourable senators may remember, various provinces were asked to appear before the committee. Mr. Parizeau, the Minister of Finance for the Province of Quebec, appeared and gave evidence for three hours. At the start of his testimony he said, "The one thing I am not interested in is the constitutional aspect of this, I want to get to the merits." So, although it was referred originally to the committee on the constitutional aspect, in fact it was discussed upon the merits and the result of those committee hearings was that the bill, in effect, was withdrawn. Later on it was re-presented with some further amendments. I remember being called upon by Judy Erola, the minister, who tried to persuade me that these amendments satisfied my objections. I told her they did not, and the bill eventually died.

I am suggesting that on a bill of this kind a proper procedure—when everybody recognizes that it is very badly drafted—would be that it should be referred to the committee before second reading.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it appears that the sponsor of the bill is not here. Honourable senators may want to show him the courtesy of allowing him to speak to this particular question since he has not had an opportunity to do so. Perhaps we should adjourn the matter in Senator Haidasz's name.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I have no objection to doing that, honourable senators, but I had rather expected that the senator who has just spoken would move an amendment to give some substance to his proposal. Was it his intention to do that? Otherwise, we are going to be faced with dealing with second reading and not with the reference of the bill to a committee.

Senator Godfrey: I think it would have a better chance of being adopted by the Senate if someone other than myself actually moved it.

Senator Steuart: Take a chance.

Senator Roblin: I never thought my honourable friend was so deficient in his self-confidence. My impression was that he had no fears of the Senate and would move anything.

Senator Godfrey: I am speaking from long experience. In the past, motions I have made have been stood for as long as three years without being dealt with. It is rather like the kiss of death for me to propose anything.

Senator Roblin: Take a chance.

Senator Godfrey: I will propose that the subject matter of this bill be referred to a committee of the Senate.

Senator Frith: Perhaps it should be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Godfrey: It should be referred to a committee for consideration, and the committee should report back to the Senate so that we know it is not being stalled.

Senator Roblin: I believe a suitable committee would be the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Senator Godfrey: Very well.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if we could have the wording of the motion. I am not sure whether it is cast in the usual way, namely, that the bill be not now read a second time but that the subject matter be referred to committee. The effect of that, of course, is to defeat the bill.

Senator Flynn: No, no.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is.

Senator MacEachen: If it is put that way, the bill is defeated because it is not now read the second time so, procedurally, the subject matter goes to committee and not the bill. The bill is not read and it disappears from the order paper.

Senator Godfrey: I understand there is a procedure whereby a motion can ask that it remain on the order paper. I will follow the procedure suggested by Senator Hayden back in 1947 which was that this bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.

The committee will report and then we can decide what course to follow. The report might suggest many amendments to the bill, but it would not, in effect, amend the bill.

Senator MacEachen: Not the bill.

Senator Godfrey: I do not know whether that defeats the bill.

Senator MacEachen: Of course.

Senator Godfrey: I do not think so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I will not rise until the senator vacates the floor.

Senator Godfrey: I would refer to Beauchesne where he says:

There are three types of amendments that may be proposed at the second reading stage of a bill. These are:

1. the six months' hoist;

That would defeat the bill. Then it goes on to state:

2. the reasoned amendment;

That again would defeat the bill. Then it says:

3. the referral of the subject matter to a committee.

There is no indication in Beauchesne that by referring the subject matter of a bill it defeats the bill.

Senator Frith: If you say "that it not be read a second time," the Senate has decided that it not be read a second time.

Senator Godfrey: At this time.

Senator Bonnell: Do not say that at all, just refer the subject matter.

Senator Godfrey: I will revise this again. I would suggest that we refer the subject matter.

[Senator Godfrey.]

I am sorry that I followed the precedent of Senator Hayden. I thought that was a correct procedure in 1947, but we did not have such sharp minds around here then.

I would suggest that the subject matter of the bill be referred and that the bill remain on the order paper.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the substance of the motion is acceptable to me, namely, that the subject matter be studied in committee but that the bill retain its place on the order paper. I doubt whether the motion, as put, is regular. I think that the acceptance of this ingenious improvisation would require unanimous consent. Although I do not want to make a point of it, I did want to intervene so as to avoid a situation where an honourable senator would have his bill virtually defeated in his absence, which would have happened if the original motion put forward by Senator Godfrey had been accepted.

● (1430)

Senator Roblin: Perhaps I could put forward a constructive suggestion. It is not our wish on this side of the house to defeat a bill in the absence of its sponsor. I think I made that quite clear in my previous remarks on this subject. It is clear, however, that the wording of the amendment, if one is desired, does present some problems in terms of dealing with the question of second reading, the matter of principle and the status of the bill thereafter. Might I suggest that we allow Senator Godfrey the privilege of considering in detail the exact wording of his motion so that, if it comes back, it avoids the pitfall that has been pointed out, becomes more acceptable to senators and is in tune with what I think is our established custom of giving ourselves the right to look at matters in substance before we have to deal with them in principle.

Senator Frith: Will you adjourn the debate in his name?

Senator Roblin: I can adjourn the debate. I know that Senator Godfrey has adjourned it once; I do not think he can do so twice.

Senator Frith: He can adjourn it as many times as he likes.

Senator Roblin: In that case, if he wants to move the adjournment, I would support him.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I will move the adjournment of the debate as though my speech had not been completed. I can say that I will consult Senator MacEachen and others more expert than I so as to agree on a wording that will satisfy what we want to do.

Senator Roblin: That sounds to me like the wisdom of Solomon.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, debate adjourned.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator

MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-62, intitled: "An Act respecting employment equity"—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, there is a good deal of goodwill on this side of the chamber for the underlying intentions of Bill C-62, as described by Senator Robertson in her speech on second reading last week. Liberals have been concerned for a long time with issues which enhance equality of citizens in this country, and this bill is part of that general effort. In her speech, Senator Robertson commented on the historic nature of the bill. Concepts of employment equity have developed over many years in Canada and elsewhere, and many Canadians of all walks of life and political persuasion have contributed to the debate. Some have been more successful than others.

Honourable senators are all familiar with Mr. Diefenbaker's Bill of Rights, which was one important landmark but which suffered the disability of not taking precedence over other legislation. The bill before us today also has such a disability. As Judge Abella said in her commission report, unenforceable rights are simply rights that are not available, and unenforceable rights are no better than non-available rights.

The historical point leading up to this legislation needs to be put into context. For many years now, equality has been a part of various pieces of federal legislation. In 1977, the Canadian Human Rights Act outlawed discrimination in the labour force. In 1981, for example, there was an affirmative action pilot project in various government departments. We have pay equity in the federal jurisdiction and there is a whole history of attempts to ensure equality in the labour force for men, for women and for other target groups. So this is not at all the first piece of legislation where principle is to enshrine equality in the workplace. What is new about this legislation is the positive action side of it; that is, previous legislation has been, of necessity, based on a complaint process rather than on the systematic collection of information and action on the part of government. But as honourable senators all know, it is subsection 15(2) of the Charter, proclaimed only in April, 1985, that has made legally possible the type of action which is proposed in the bill before us today.

It is not that previous governments did not want to take positive action of this nature but, rather, that such action, if taken, was bound to be challenged, probably successfully, in the courts. However, this bill applies to the federal domain, about 11 per cent of the labour force, including the crown corporations. For several years, crown corporations—at least some of them—have been asked to make reports of the type envisaged in this legislation, certainly in terms of the gender mix of the corporation. To my knowledge, Air Canada has been doing this since 1978. These reports have gone to ministers of transport or to presidents of the Treasury Board. But the difficulty which then presented itself was this: How could that information be dealt with? What could be done with it that was legal and fair? Could governments act on the information they had if there was no complaint to the Canadian Human Rights Commission?

Honourable senators, this bill, drawn up under section 15 of the Charter, should be able to settle that question and similar questions because it is now legally possible for positive action to be taken; that is, action to ensure equality in the labour market should now arise from an investigation rather than from a complaint laid by an aggrieved individual. Unfortunately, this bill does not achieve that goal which it was intended to achieve. It was expected that after the various changes to legislation in the Canadian Human Rights Act, in the struggles over the Charter and in the recommendations which arose from the Abella commission report, the way was paved for a strong piece of legislation which would take forward some of the commitments made by this government and previous governments to greater equality and opportunity in the Canadian labour force. Unfortunately, the present bill does not provide that clarity, nor does it provide that leadership. Those who have been following the debate on Bill C-62 in the other place will know that it has been a highly contentious piece of legislation. A great many groups of interested people—people with disabilities, representatives of women's groups, native peoples, visible minorities, employers and federations that operate under the federal jurisdiction—have spoken out on this bill, most often to correct or change it.

There appear to be two schools of thought. One is that it is such a weak bill that it would be better to defeat it entirely on the ground that it results in more damage than service to the idea of equality or, to put it another way, employers and workers will get the false notion that this is employment equity in action, which it is not. This bill is not what Judge Abella envisaged in her report, which strongly recommended legislated positive action on employment equity. It is not what activists in the field had in mind; it is not what those who fought for subsection 15(2) of the Charter had in mind. What is, perhaps, even more significant is that it will not provide an orderly process for employers or workers to follow.

The second school of thought argues that half a loaf is better than none and that the bill should be strengthened and shored up. The view is that, since an amendment made in the House of Commons provides that it contain a clause which says that it shall be reviewed in five years' time, then we should take the opportunity to turn it into a proper piece of employment equity legislation. Inside the federal public service, where at least two agencies stand to gain or lose by this bill, in the public at large and in interest groups which stand to gain and lose there is widespread agreement that this is not a satisfactory piece of legislation.

I am glad to say that some progress was made through amendments in the other place as a result of strong efforts made by interest groups, by opposition members, by members of the NDP and by Mr. Gordon Fairweather, Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

There are four components which are essential to any legislation which seeks to improve the labour market situation through positive action or employment equity. They can be put in the form of four questions: First, who will be affected by this legislation? Will the appropriate groups be affected?

Second, through what process will employment equity be brought about in the legislation? Third, how is that process triggered? Fourth, what enforcement mechanism is incorporated into the bill?

First, the groups to be touched by this legislation are workers only in the federal domain; that is, workers in transportation, communications, financial institutions, crown corporations and other organizations under the federal jurisdiction but not, strangely enough, members of the federal public service, who are explicitly exempted. The argument has been made that these federal employees are covered by Treasury Board policy. But such policies can be changed with no reference to Parliament, and therefore are deliberately put beyond the scope of employment equity in this case.

● (1440)

It is true that a previous Liberal government introduced the Treasury Board policy on affirmative action, as it was called at that time. However, that was never meant to be more than a preliminary step; it was never meant to be the last word—and that was one of the underlying reasons for bringing in the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, which, of course, would make this possible. We find that to be an unsatisfactory limitation to this bill.

But there is a second one, in terms of coverage. This legislation applies only to employers of 100 or more workers. This is quite inappropriately restrictive. For example, most branches of banks employ fewer than 100 employees, and the Fair Employment Practices Section of the Canada Labour Code defines "employer" as "a person who employs five or more employees . . .". Although it would be hard to establish levels of employment of minorities, native people, or people with disabilities, with a staff as small as five, levels for the employment of women could be established with a staff of this size. Also, many large employers can only implement employment equity if it is made a line management function. Thus administrative groupings of less than 100 are likely to be more relevant reporting units—and that point, I might say, has been made by the Canadian Bankers' Association.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women believes that a limit of 100 is premature before studies establish the number of employers excluded by such a limit. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council suggested a floor of 25 employees, and the Coalition of Visible Minorities suggested no floor at all.

On the matter, then, of whom the bill refers to and how coverage is described in the bill, we are much less than satisfied.

The second question is: What process is being put into play to ensure that employment equity actually takes place?

Three requirements, which are consistent with employment equity practices, are contained in the bill, in clauses 4, 5 and 6. Clause 4 requires that an employer, in consultation with the union or employee representative—I should point out that these are my words; I am not quoting from the bill—implement employment equity by getting rid of employment practices which result in employment barriers against people in the designated groups, and by putting into place positive policies and practices so that employees in the designated groups are represented at least in proportion to their representation in the workplace or in the surrounding labour market. This is otherwise known as the creation of targets for employment, and is very well studied, documented and practised in other jurisdictions.

Clause 5 requires the employer to draw up a plan establishing goals. That is the other usual component of employment equity. The employer must keep that plan in her or his principal place of business in Canada for at least three years after the plan no longer applies. So the employer is required to prepare a plan—but in this instance, we should note, not with consultation with the employees, the affected groups, the union or the employee association, but entirely at the employer's discretion. We regard this as a serious limitation and one which does not apply to clause 4, and therefore it is a puzzle as to why it applies to clause 5.

Clause 6 requires that the employer file by June 1, 1988, and every June 1 thereafter, a set of data containing her or his employees by industrial sector, occupational group, salary range and turnover, referring in each case to the designated groups.

The advantage of employment equity, as described by Judge Abella in her report, and based in part on her studies and 20 years of experience with these practices in the United States, is that by setting goals and targets, and by examining personnel data, it is possible to see if discrimination is taking place, or if, in fact, employment equity is on the way and is having any impact. For years both the federal and the provincial domains in Canada have tried voluntary employment equity. It has not proved very successful. The evidence from the United States suggests that mandatory action not only is more successful but provides a more orderly climate for everyone. It is very much liked and appreciated in the United States by business. They testified recently that they would prefer to keep mandatory affirmative action; and employers and unions feel much the same way—which brings us to the question of enforcement.

If the Canadian employer does comply with clauses 4, 5 and 6, establishes goals and timetables, gets rid of discriminatory employment practices, and sends in a report on these matters, what happens? The minister then sends on a copy of the report to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The minister also consolidates those reports and tables them in Parliament. No individual company can be scrutinized, no report is made to the minister of those who fail to comply, and it is at least questionable whether the Canadian Human Rights Commission has the power or capacity to make use of the data which will be passed on to it under this bill. I will return to that question. If the employer fails to comply with only one section, section 6, of the three sections which are part of the employment equity process, that employer may be guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding $50,000.

Why is there no necessity for an employer to comply with the requirement under the other sections, 4 or 5—that is, the requirement of having a plan—and why is there no necessity for an employer to remove discriminatory employment practices? In effect, what the government is doing, by excluding clauses 4 and 5 from the enforcement and penalties found in clause 7, is putting in, through the back door, another set of voluntary guidelines. This is not at all satisfactory. In fact, the President of the American Manufacturers' Association is reported to have said, on a similar matter in the United States, when arguing in favour of mandatory affirmative action, that if people responded to voluntary measures for changing their ways, Moses would have come down with ten guidelines instead of ten commandments.

We are not at all happy with the reintroduction of voluntary compliance with clauses 4 and 5 of the bill, and we wish to examine that point in great detail when the bill is considered in committee.

Let us return to the question of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, which is, by default rather than by statement in this bill, the agency of enforcement which the government proposes to use. The minister has said that informally, but one would not know that by examining the bill. It was argued by many witnesses and commentators on this bill at an earlier stage that a separate enforcement agency should be established. The Canadian Human Rights Commission has a huge backlog of cases to deal with—I understand that it will take over two years to deal with them. The commission is understaffed and underbudgeted, and there is no assurance at all that the Canadian Human Rights Commission would be in any position to use the material generated by this legislation to improve the situation for designated groups over the next decade. After all, they do not have to actually report this data until 1988.

At present the Canadian Human Rights Commission operates almost exclusively on complaint by aggrieved parties. The entire point of employment equity is that this process of action be changed. Under the concept of employment equity—as is the case, for example, in Manitoba, in its legislation on pay equity; and also in connection with the proposed pay equity in Ontario—the enforcement agency may survey the data to see if the pattern of pay, or employment, or advancement suggests some systemic discrimination, and then investigate and bring about change accordingly.

Does the Canadian Human Rights Commission have sufficient power to police Bill C-62 should it pass? This is a question that we would like to investigate thoroughly, perhaps with Mr. Gordon Fairweather, the commissioner. The Canadian Human Rights Act, section 32(3) gives the commission the power to lay a complaint if the commission has reasonable grounds to believe that discrimination is occurring. Is that sufficient power? The government argues that it is. If it is, why is the Canadian Human Rights Commission not named in clause 7 as the designated enforcement agency for this legislation?

Finally, there is a most puzzling movement toward contract compliance in this bill. The Abella commission explained in detail why contract compliance is an effective means of demonstrating commitment to employment equity. In this bill, the definition of “employer” includes any person who employs 100 or more employees which, as I have already argued, we believe is much too high a number. Such an employer employs people on or in connection with federal work, undertakings or business. In her response of March 8, 1985 to the Abella commission, the Honourable Flora MacDonald stated that contract compliance will be implemented, but by Treasury Board policy. That is not satisfactory. It should be included in this legislation because in that way it is in front of Parliament and the people of the country and can be both fair and seen to be fair. In addition, the minister stated that contract compliance would only apply on contracts of $200,000 or more. There is evidence that in 1985 only 500 of the 54,834 suppliers to the federal government had contracts of this amount. Various groups testifying before the committee on the other side have recommended that a much lower floor be set on the contract compliance movement, such as $20,000 or even lower. We will want to examine this matter as it relates to clause 4 of this bill.

These comments are not meant to restrict any questions or challenges to this bill which might arise in committee or in this chamber. The comments are meant to show that we regard this legislation as being along the lines of a Potemkin village—all shiny front with the same miserable problems that existed previously maintained behind the facade. It is not satisfactory, and we will do our best to ensure that improvements are made to the bill or that some other course of action is taken to provide support for the women, the visible minorities, the people with disabilities and native peoples, whose opportunities could be enhanced through the implementation of section 15 of the Charter, and who require and deserve better legislation than this to guarantee equality in the labour markets of Canada.

Our purpose, as I think it is the purpose of the government, is to have a good law, a law that can be understood clearly by employees and employers alike, an enforceable law that brings an orderly climate to this issue. We were shocked at the minister's suggestion, reported in the Globe and Mail of February 5, that she will publicly embarrass employers who do not produce results under this legislation. We regard this statement by the minister as a shameful one. In our country employers and employees should be provided with clear laws and regulations that can be complied with, rather than being embarrassed by the relevant minister. The minister is also quoted in the same article as saying on the matter of contract compliance, “They'd better be keeping records, because we'll be investigating . . . you never know, if you're a contractor, when we're coming to your door.” Threatening employers is most inappropriate, and we will try to ensure that this cannot happen.

Honourable senators, we believe that there is a common will to put in place good, sound, equitable legislation which brings an effective end to the systemic discrimination which has prevented so many people with disabilities, so many native people, so many members of visible minority groups and so very many women from equal chances to work, to get ahead in the work place and, therefore, to lead equal and independent lives.

Our goal is to improve this legislation. We hope that this will be possible.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, unless any other honourable senator wishes to take part in the debate at this time, I move that this order stand until tomorrow and that it stand in the name of the Honourable Senator McElman.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator McElman.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

THIRTIETH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, for the adoption of the Thirtieth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (budgetary situation pertaining to Senate Committees), presented in the Senate on 1st May, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, on Thursday last I was asked to give my consent to a motion not to put the Thirtieth Report of this committee on the order paper for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate, but to give it consideration on that same day. After some debate, it was moved that the report be adopted without one day's notice and without a copy of it being on my desk. I had not received a copy of the report of this committee. I am following the advice of my good leader, the Honourable Senator MacEachen, who said something to the effect that if you want these things to go through without due notice and if you want unanimous consent, get the reports up here so we can see what you are doing in the committee and so we can see what you are asking us to approve.

I thought that if they wanted to adopt the report so hurriedly and if it was so urgent, at least they would type up extra copies and leave one on my desk so that I would have an opportunity to read it. Therefore, I thought that I had the right as a senator to stand and to say, "nay." After further debate, I began to get the feeling that I was doing something terrible, that I was doing something that was against the rules of the Senate. I thought that I might be asked to leave my seat for a day and to appear before the bar. But then I got out the rule book. Thank God for rule books. With confidence, I sat back and said to myself, "If nobody but me knows the rules, it is good that someone knows them."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: After I had an opportunity to read the report and after further thought, I found that I could not agree more with the mover of the motion. I came to the conclusion that it was a good thing that he was trying to do. If only he had taken a little time to explain things to me a little more, I probably would have agreed to the motion and let things go ahead Thursday last. Being a good Prince Edward Islander, like my friend Senator Macquarrie, we don't mind being led but we don't like being shoved.

Senator Phillips: Led or labelled?

Senator Bonnell: Consequently, honourable senators, I agree with the motion. I agree that it is a good motion and, therefore, without any further debate on it, I will support the motion that the report be adopted.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators—

● (1500)

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Frith speaks now his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I welcome the support of Senator Bonnell for this motion, so graciously and freely given just a few moments ago. On some of the points he made, I do remind senators who would like to see the matter in full context, that they should read what was said on the matter in Debates of the Senate, of Thursday last.

Of course, any time that anyone is asking leave to proceed without due notice, they are pushing instead of leading. I was not suggesting that we proceed without leave. In fact, I asked for leave, as I realized I had to. At that time, I thought I had explained why I was asking to proceed immediately, but apparently I did not explain sufficiently clearly to satisfy Senator Bonnell and without giving him an opportunity to consider what I had to say.

However, I think we should also underline what he has said with respect to all cases in which one is asking leave to proceed without due notice. It is an excellent suggestion on his part that not only an explanation be given—which I tried to give—but that the document upon which the request for leave is based be before the senators who are being asked to give leave. In this case, that would have been easy because it was a very short report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH AND TWENTY-NINTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE—ORDERS STAND

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Twenty-eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Banking, Trade and Commerce), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Consideration of the Twenty-ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Energy and Natural Resources), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, with respect to Orders Nos. 11 and 12 which deal with the supplementary budgets of Banking, Trade and Commerce and Energy and Natural Resources, respectively, I explained on an earlier occasion that the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration is in the process of reviewing all committee budgets. In that connection, a meeting of all committee chairmen has been set for Thursday of this week to consider these matters, so I give that explanation as to why I believe these two items should stand until next Tuesday.

Orders stand.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and Other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that all we are waiting for in this case is the approval of the budget by the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration. I understand that the budget has been presented to the subcommittee and will be reported this Thursday to the main committee, so again we should deal with this matter on Tuesday of next week. I ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly, pursuant to notice of April 29, 1986, moved:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to provide a forum to examine, consider, evaluate, consolidate and synthesize available research, documentation and other information relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians;

That the Committee identify any areas where further study, research or investigation is called for;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than December 19, 1986.

He said: Honourable senators, I promise to be substantially briefer than I was on January 30 of this year. At that time, I rose in this chamber to present a motion for the appointment of a special committee of the Senate to investigate current and future terrorist activity in Canada, or directed at Canadians. My motive was to initiate an effective nonpartisan review of terrorism as it affects, or may affect, Canada and Canadians. I wanted that review to be conducted in a calm and deliberate manner, before a major terrorist incident occurred in Canada or against Canadians. I wanted a review that would be positive and helpful to governments and others responsible for, or concerned with, countering terrorism.

Honourable senators, much has happened since that time, and to go over the litany that I recited on January 30 and add what has happened since then would serve no useful purpose. The eyes of the world are focused on the issue of terrorism. It was a major and high-priority item at the summit meeting in Japan. Therefore I think it serves no useful purpose to simply rehash the whole matter.

What I do suggest, and this is the reason for setting up this committee that is being recommended to you, is that ultimate solutions to this problem will require the efforts of all of us, and not least, in my opinion, the efforts of this chamber. I said at the outset today that my hope was to institute an effective and nonpartisan review of this most serious subject and to conduct this review in a calm and deliberate manner. I believe these words relate most appropriately to the traditional conduct of this chamber and of its committees.

Since I introduced my original motion in January, I have spoken to a number of senators from both sides of this chamber and to government officials and to ministers. From these conversations, I came to the conclusion that the original mandate was, indeed, too broad. That was a point raised by Senator Frith, and I found that more people agreed with Senator Frith than agreed with me. I would like to say that I, too, now agree with Senator Frith. It was, indeed, too broad.

Senator Frith: My cup runneth over.

Senator Kelly: The mandate of the newly-proposed special committee has been reduced considerably. At this point, I would like to refer to an article that appeared in today's Globe and Mail with reference to terrorism and with reference to the many people who are currently studying the issue, and who have for many years monitored the issue of terrorism, many of whom are academics. David Charters, who is deputy director of the Centre for Conflict Studies at the University of New Brunswick, said:

You don't have to be right alongside people to look at, say, the patterns of operations and make assessments of these and learn from historical experience.

Mr. Cummings, a spokesman for the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service, said that academics and others studying the subject are performing a valuable service. He went on to say:

They're doing a lot of research that an organization such as ours might not have the resources to do.

That relates, then, to the first part of the mandate recommended for the special committee, that is to act as a forum for the accumulation of information in order that we may know more about the subject so that we can make better policies and mount more effective responses. What is contemplated here is inviting people such as Charters, Tugwell and others whom we know to come before such a special committee to offer their views. In that way we could see if there is not some consensus at which we can arrive that would enable such a special committee to offer sound advice.

● (1510)

The history of Senate committees, the integrity for which they are recognized in their performance and the balance with which they approach their problems would constitute valuable elements that today I do not think exist elsewhere.

The second part of the mandate is to review the role of the media with respect to terrorist threats and incidents, and to draw on the unique experience of several senators in this chamber—Senators Doyle, MacDonald, Davey, Grafstein. I think this special committee could set a background against which media people could discuss this situation dispassionately. Having a special Senate committee avoids the risk that a government would face if it moved to discuss this subject. If a government moved to do so strictly within government, the first logical response would be that the government was trying to muzzle the press. Whereas, to invite discussion by media people among media people with the assistance of members of this chamber could do nothing less than serve some useful purpose. Honourable senators, in my view this is an important initiative.

Let me relate, briefly, something that is near and dear to my heart to explain why this kind of initiative is important to me. Some years ago I used to fly frequently to and from Beirut. When I first started that, I used to see what I saw at every airport—the second level gallery with families gathering to watch airplanes land and take off, sentries, and so forth. Then all of a sudden—almost overnight—the airplanes landed and parked a thousand feet from the door of the building. In the public gallery there were no longer families watching the airplanes landing and taking off. The sentries were still there, but they carried themselves and their weapons differently. Those of us who were soldiers know that soldiers are trained to carry their weapons in many different ways, but two of the extreme ways are, first of all, with the weapon slung behind the sentry's back indicating that the sentry is not on alert. That is the way they carried their weapons when families gathered on the second floor gallery. The other extreme way is to carry the weapon in what they call the ready position, hands on the weapon in the alert position. I saw the same thing in Tehran.

Last week, honourable senators, I came out of my office in the Victoria Building and outside of the United States Embassy I saw what was so familiar to me in Lebanon and in Tehran—an officer holding a machine gun. He was on alert; he carried his weapon in the ready position.

This happened in the capital city of my country. There is nothing wrong with that, but it is a sign of the times we live in and the issues we are faced with, and indicates the concern we should all have for these issues.

I watched a man walking along carrying what appeared to be a pocket radio. I found myself doing what I had not done for 16 years—that is, thinking through the situation: That man was coming towards me. If I stayed on course, he would go past me and the officer with the machine gun in the ready position, if he had to shoot, could shoot me as well. I crossed to the other side of the street. I have never had to do that before in my own country.

Honourable senators, it is that kind of thing that makes me believe that we all have to do what we can, and I think the Senate can play a role. I think the mandate was too broad in my earlier motion; I think the current mandate is logical and legitimate.

It has been suggested that perhaps such a review could be undertaken by one of the existing standing committees of the Senate. Those that come to mind are the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, the Special National Defence Committee and the Foreign Affairs Committee. That is a legitimate suggestion because the subject relates to the mandate and responsibility of any one of those three committees. My concern is that to add a subject as important as this subject is to Canada and to Canadians to a larger agenda—for example, if it goes to Legal and Constitutional Affairs, it will follow the Smoking Prohibition Bill which was suggested earlier this day should be referred to that committee, and I am not being cynical or trying to make this appear foolish at all—is to fall short of guaranteeing that the matter receives the attention it deserves.

I am sure that no one in this chamber disagrees with the suggestion that terrorism and its implications for Canada is a serious and urgent matter.

I have already said on many occasions, and I say again now that I believe the Senate can perform a valuable service through such a special committee. Honourable senators, I earnestly request your support of this motion.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, May 6, 1986

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

On March 4, 1986, a Message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to their Standing Orders was referred to your Committee for consideration and report.

Your Committee met on March 4, March 11, April 29 and May 5 to examine the matter and now makes the following report.

Your Committee recommends that Rule 67(1) be amended

(i) by deleting paragraphs (a) to (e) and substituting the following therefor:

(a) The Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to which shall be appointed eight senators.

(b) The Joint Committee on Official Languages to which shall be appointed nine senators.

(c) The Joint Committee on Parliament to which shall be appointed twelve senators.

(ii) by re-lettering the subsequent paragraphs accordingly.

Your Committee further recommends that a Message be sent to the House of Commons as follows:

Resolved—That the Senate notes the new practice of the House of Commons regarding reports from recognized inter-parliamentary delegations. The practice of the Senate is that a senator who participates in an officially recognized inter-parliamentary delegation may, upon presenting a notice of inquiry, call the attention of the Senate to the work of the delegation, its final report if any, and the conclusions of any conference or meetings attended;

That the Senate agrees to the establishment of a Joint Committee on Parliament to which the Senate will appoint the same number of members as the House of Commons, namely twelve senators. It is the view of the Senate that the membership of this Committee should be reduced to seven members of the House of Commons and seven senators;

That the Senate supports the empowering of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments to include in a report to the House a proposed motion which, if the report be concurred in, would become an Order to the Ministry to rescind a single specified regulation or other Statutory Instrument which the Ministry has the authority to rescind;

That the Senate notes the procedure whereby the annual report of the Commissioner of Official Languages is deemed referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages immediately upon the report being laid on the Table. The practice of the Senate is that, upon the adoption of a motion for referral, Reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages are referred to the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages;

That the Senate notes the procedure of the House of Commons regarding the meeting of its Striking Committee. The Senate, in accordance with its present practice contained in Rule 66 of the Rules of the Senate of Canada, appoints a Committee of Selection at the commencement of each session which nominates senators to serve on joint committees for the duration of that session;

That the Senate notes the new method of substitution of members on joint committees adopted by the House of Commons. The present Senate practice is set forth in Rule 66(4) and (5) whereby a change in the membership of a committee may be made by a notice filed with the Clerk of the Senate who shall cause such change to be recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate. This notice is to be signed with respect to Government members, by the Leader of the Government in the Senate or any senator named by that Leader and with respect to Opposition members, it must be signed by the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate or any senator named by that Leader.

Ordered,—That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to inform that House of the consideration which the Senate has given to certain changes in the Standing Orders of the House of Commons.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT,
Chairman.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TENTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Wednesday, May 7, 1986

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

By order of reference, dated December 17, 1985, your Committee was asked to report on the establishment of a "Register of Senators' Interests". Your Committee was also asked to report on any other matters relating to the registration of senators' interests, including those listed in the order. Your Committee considered the order of reference at its meeting on April 24, 1986 and now reports as follows:

Your Committee is of the view that the question of senators' interests is one that cannot be studied without considering the wider context of the existing provisions of law governing conflict of interest to which both senators and members of the House of Commons are subject. These provisions are contained in the Criminal Code and in the Senate and House of Commons Act.

The provisions on conflict of interest in the Criminal Code deal with various forms of prohibited conduct in broad, general terms that leave some doubt as to whether they were intended to apply to Parliamentarians. In interpreting these provisions, the courts have reached certain conclusions regarding their applicability to members of both Houses that raise a number of policy questions regarding the law in its present form.

The rules on conflict of interest in the Senate and House of Commons Act, on the other hand, duplicate in part some of the rules in the Criminal Code and, having been drafted many years ago, contain provisions that, in view of the changed social and economic circumstances of today's society, may well be considered to be outmoded in terms of the penalties they prescribe and the ethical standards they reflect.

To create a register of senators' interests now would be to create a new rule of procedure relating to conflict of interest at a time when policy considerations underlying existing laws are at best unclear.

Your Committee, therefore, recommends that the Government instruct its law officers, in consultation with Parliamentary counsel to both Houses, to review the entire question of conflict of interest as it applies to Parliamentarians in the light of the present statutory and case law on the subject.

Your Committee further recommends that any proposals for the reform of existing laws resulting from such a review be referred to the appropriate committee of each House, or to a joint committee of both Houses, for consideration and report.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Molgat, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

TERRORISM

TOKYO SUMMIT STATEMENT—GOVERNMENT POLICY RE LIBYAN NATIONALS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government arising from the statement issued by the seven summit leaders at the Tokyo meeting. We were certainly pleased that the summit communiqué contained a statement on terrorism in which the summit leaders committed themselves to undertake a number of measures to be applied to countries engaging in terrorism, and in that respect Libya was cited. One of the measures reads as follows:

Stricter immigration and visa requirements and procedures in respect of nationals of states which sponsor or support terrorism.

Inasmuch as the summit leaders have identified Libya as a country which sponsors terrorism, can the Leader of the Government tell us what measures, by way of increased restrictions, will be applied to Libyan nationals, particularly Libyan students in Canada?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is true that the summit arrived at a statement of principles or of goals that they hope to implement with respect to the question raised by my honourable friend; namely, the immigration and visa requirements for certain nationals within Canada. However, at the present time and to the best of my knowledge, our exact response to that observation has yet to be worked out. It may be a day or two before I have specific information that I can give my honourable friend, so I shall take the question as notice.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, on the question of terrorism and particularly in view of the impact that such a measure would have on nationals of Libya who are resident in Canada, I wonder whether Canada has resisted this particular measure or any other measures which have been proposed at the summit, and whether the Leader of the Government can throw any light on that matter.

Senator Roblin: I am sorry, I have no information as to the discussions that took place at the summit. I am relying on the press releases that were issued at the time.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the British Information Services issued a statement yesterday in which they outlined the measures that were taken by summit countries on the question of terrorism. The statement goes on to say:

This level of action goes substantially further than the statement at the London Summit two years ago, which was also a British initiative. Sir Geoffrey Howe said that it had been "quite difficult" to achieve such a degree of commitment, but he stressed that there was no horse-trading involved, but rather all the horses were running the same way—some simply needed more encouragement, almost certainly Japan and Canada.

Inasmuch as the British Foreign Secretary has cited Canada as a country which needed encouragement to join up with the statement on terrorism, I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can throw any light on this and tell us whether the statement by Sir Geoffrey Howe does not, in fact, represent the position which was taken by Canada at the summit.

Senator Roblin: I think I should say that Canada will speak for itself in these matters, and while Sir Geoffrey Howe is at liberty to say whatever he likes, there is no reason to think that that represents the Canadian position unless we specifically say so.

I have said to my friend that I will obtain some information for him which will indicate the measures that we are taking to fulfil our part in the undertaking entered into in Tokyo, and I will do that.

Senator MacEachen: Will the Leader of the Government attempt at least to clarify the situation so that Canada will not be left with what is, in a sense, a stricture on its willingness to engage in measures against terrorism which seems to flow from this particular statement attributed to Sir Geoffrey Howe? He states that Canada needed encouragement to reach the level of commitment achieved by the summit.

Senator Roblin: I have no reason to think that the statement is accurate in any particular. In fact, my impression is that Canada was one of the leaders in proposing that measures be taken that were more adequate than the ones we have at the present time. However, owing to the fact that I was not there and was not privy to those discussions, I do not think I should depart from my position, except to say to my friend that I will get whatever information I can for him.

Senator MacEachen: I thank the Leader of the Government for that assurance. It is all the more interesting to find out exactly what the position of the Government of Canada is, because the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Shultz, went out of his way to praise the leadership provided by the United Kingdom at Tokyo on the question of terrorism, and did not refer to any other country. That exclusion, linked with the comments of Sir Geoffrey Howe, I think, entitles us to have some clarification from the Government of Canada. I therefore thank the Leader of the Government for his assurance that he will attempt to get some additional information.

Senator Roblin: Yes. I think it would be a mistake to make the linkage that my friend has done with respect to those two statements.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

BILATERAL TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CANADIAN USE OF LOBBYIST—CANADIAN TESTIMONY BEFORE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE OR SPECIAL PROSECUTOR—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to follow up on a different subject which relates to the employment of Mr. Deaver as a special assistant to the Canadian Embassy in Washington. I noticed today that the Globe and Mail has asserted that the Canadian government has declined to have its officials testify before a U.S. Congressional committee or a special prosecutor, if one is appointed.

My question is really one of fact: Is it a fact that the Government of Canada has said that Canadian officials will not be permitted to testify on this matter before a special prosecutor or before a Congressional committee?

● (1410)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I can say that Canada is adhering to its position under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, which excludes the possibility of diplomats being called upon to testify before the courts of other countries. However, we are trying to be as co-operative as we can within the limits of that convention by providing the authorities in the United States with voluntary information. That does not involve an appearance before the committee, but it does involve giving those authorities some of the facts in connection with this matter.

I have been told that Ambassador Gotlieb has written to the United States authorities, not only regarding the contract itself, but regarding further matters that may be of interest to the United States authorities with respect to Canada's relationship with Mr. Deaver.

Senator MacEachen: Would it be possible to obtain a copy of the letter Mr. Gotlieb has written to the United States authorities? I ask that because I also noticed in the same newspaper that it is alleged the Canadian Embassy did hold discussions with Mr. Deaver while he was an employee of the White House with respect to his possible appointment or engagement in the employ of Canada.

I should like to know whether discussions were, indeed, held between any officials of Canada and Mr. Deaver on this subject while he was still an employee of the White House, as is alleged in that newspaper.

Senator Roblin: I do not think the allegation is correct. I believe that in his correspondence with the United States authorities the Canadian ambassador has given the details as to when the matter was first raised with Mr. Deaver. I think Mr. Deaver is entirely in accord with the law and legislation of the United States with respect to lobbying, and matters of that sort.

With respect to the actual letter itself, it may very well be that I can provide a copy for my friend. I will make inquiries in that regard.

ROYAL VISIT

STATE DINNER, VANCOUVER—COMPOSITION OF GUEST LIST

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, during the recent visit of Their Royal Highnesses, the Prince and Princess of Wales, to Vancouver for the purpose of officially opening Expo '86, there was a state dinner given by the Government of Canada. I emphasize the fact that it was billed as a "state dinner". The fact is that an endless number of Tory contributors and supporters were imported all the way from Montreal and Toronto to attend that state dinner to the exclusion of many Privy Councillors of the Province of British Columbia. I am not one, so I am not complaining about not being invited myself.

That was just cheap politics, but a fact that was not cheap politics—it was worse—was that the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia and his wife were not invited until public pressure made it imperative that they receive an invitation at the last moment.

Honourable senators will recall that I asked a similar question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate at the time of President Reagan's visit to Quebec City when the Governor General of Canada was similarly slighted, to which I have not received a reply, incidentally.

I wonder if the Prime Minister of Canada now considers himself to be the Head of State for ceremonial purposes in Canada, if not for legal purposes.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): No, honourable senators.

Senator van Roggen: He acts as though he does.

NUCLEAR DISASTER

UKRAINE—EFFECTS OF RADIATION—GOVERNMENT ADVICE TO CANADIAN TRAVELLERS

Hon. Stanley Haidasz: Honourable senators, earlier this afternoon I had the privilege of attending with some honourable senators and members of the other place an emergency meeting called by the Ukrainian-Canadian Committee, Ottawa Branch, regarding any information about and implications of the nuclear explosion at Chernobyl in Ukraine.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate tell us what advice Canadian travellers and their kin can expect from the Canadian government in view of this immense nuclear disaster, and, in particular, should any Canadian tourists travel this spring and summer to Ukraine and the neighbouring countries?

● (1415)

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I would hesitate to pose as an expert in these matters myself, but I can tell my honourable friend that there is provision made for a nuclear response hot line. The telephone number is 998-3624. Any person who is concerned about travel plans and the danger of nuclear contamination is advised to phone that number and tell the people concerned where he, or she, intends to go. I am sure they can get a much better answer than I can give in general terms now.

I can say that we have been concerned about the area around the plant in Ukraine. That takes in a lot of territory. It is almost all of southern Russia, Byelorussia, and it also takes in, in some respects, parts of Poland. But that seems to be, at the present time, the limit of the danger area.

However, I would be much happier if my friend were to tell his inquirers to call that telephone number and get the real McCoy.

Senator Haidasz: I have a supplementary question. The members at this meeting also expressed concern and frustration that six days have passed since an urgent telegram was sent to the Secretary of State for External Affairs asking for particulars about this nuclear explosion.

Since the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister are out of the country and are expected to be so for the next week, could the Leader of the Government in the Senate use his good offices to make sure that a reply to that telegram is sent without further delay?

Senator Roblin: Part of the problem may be that the government itself does not have any further information than that which has already been given to the public. We have given all of the information we have to the public as we get it. Unfortunately, as everybody knows, the reporting of the accident from the Soviet Union has not been as prompt, or, I think, as accurate as we would like to have it; consequently our sources of information are poor.

The matter, however, may be elucidated by the International Atomic Energy Agency which has sent delegates to Moscow to look into the nuclear disaster and also by the fact that some American nuclear experts are in Moscow as well. So we may get more information.

I can also say that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is now at the World Health Organization assembly in Geneva and he is going to be talking about the Chernobyl incident at that meeting.

I will ask about the telegram. The problem is, we do not know any more than what we have already said, but I will keep in mind my honourable friend's request for the information and when we can provide it, I hope we may do so.

Senator Haidasz: Honourable senators, I have another supplementary question. Now that we have learned that even the Minister of National Health and Welfare is out of the country, could the Leader of the Government inform us who is the senior cabinet minister in the government responsible for matters of information and advice at the present time?

Senator Roblin: I can tell my honourable friend that I tabled that information in the Senate just a few minutes ago.

PUBLISHING INDUSTRY

CANADIAN SHARE OF MARKET

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, earlier this week, the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, the Honourable Sinclair Stevens, announced the approval of the takeover by Longman, a United Kingdom publishing giant, of Copp Clark Pitman Ltd., a publishing firm in Canada that was a subsidiary of another foreign firm.

On the face of it, this approval is contrary to the goals of increasing Canadian content, Canadian books and Canadian book publishing as set forth earlier this year by the Minister of Communications, the Honourable Marcel Masse. It also appears contrary to the Investment Canada Act which has special rules safeguarding Canadian cultural industries such as publishing.

Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate advise the Senate how this approval will reduce the close-to 80 per cent of the Canadian marketplace which is filled by books prepared, written and published by people who are resident outside of Canada; and how this step will help repatriate this market which is dominated outside of the country?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): If my memory is correct, honourable senators, the transaction referred to was initiated before my colleague, the Honourable Marcel Masse, made his statement about cultural policy and publishing, so it is considered in the light of the rules existing at that time rather than in the light of the changes brought in by my colleague.

[Senator Roblin.]

I think, however, in spite of what I said, a number of very special conditions were attached to this transaction, that were aimed at preserving the state of the market, the area of action, the opportunities for Canadian authors and, as a matter of fact, some arrangements were made to transfer to this new company rights that it did not formerly have which would enhance its market position in Canada.

Honourable senators, I should like to take the question as notice because the conditions were several and I do not have them all at my fingertips. I think when my honourable friend sees them he will see that reasonable actions were taken.

Senator Grafstein: When the Leader of the Government seeks that information, could he specifically indicate the increase in the number of Canadian titles by Canadian authors proposed by the company so that we can determine whether or not the after is better than the before?

Senator Roblin: If we have that information it can be supplied, but I do not think I can undertake to get it otherwise.

AGRICULTURE

UNITED STATES AND EEC SUBSIDIES—CANADIAN POSITION AT TOKYO ECONOMIC SUMMIT

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. Could he bring us up to date on the position taken by Canada at the recent economic summit meeting in Tokyo with regard to agricultural subsidies being used in the export trade by both the United States and EEC countries? Has anything concrete been accomplished? What steps, if any, have the nations at the summit agreed to take to deal with this problem?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I believe the government is of the opinion that a great deal was accomplished in connection with this matter, because, for the first time that I am aware of, the seven nations who attended agreed to consider the question of agricultural subsidies in the light of protectionist influences in the world today.

Up until the present time, of course, France, among others, has resolutely refused to consider any alteration in its policies. I think, as the Prime Minister of Great Britain is quoted as saying, agriculture is now moving up to the front burner.

The fact that it is now going to be placed on the agenda for the GATT discussions, which start next September, and that it has been placed before the OECD in connection with its protectionist thrust, I think would indicate that some progress has been made.

However, I do not want to overstate the case. I think we are a long way from getting the kind of action my honourable friend would like to see in respect of agricultural subsidies provided by the European Economic Community, by the United States and, of course, by this country as well. I think we have broken through the crust, that we may say progress has been made and that there is some hope these matters may be reviewed in a way that is favourable to the nation. But I am not interested in overstating the matter. I can tell you that we have a long way to go before we are going to be satisfied.

Senator Argue: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government has made an interesting statement, namely, that the question of the export subsidies will be raised at the forthcoming meeting of GATT. I hope that is true; but I would ask the Leader of the Government to underline it, so that we can be reassured, because the following statement was made by Thomas Walkom in an article in today's issue of the Globe and Mail:

Agriculture will be very much a part of the package—I guess that has to do with GATT.

But U.S. Treasury Secretary James Baker said the decision to push for the inclusion of agriculture in GATT negotiations "wasn't made here." And there was no reference in the official summit communique that the seven would push agriculture for the next round of talks by GATT,

And so on. It goes on to say:

The summit communique yesterday called on the next GATT round to include services, intellectual property (patents) and foreign investment in its discussions.

So one part of that article says that the statement made no reference to agriculture coming before GATT. As if to emphasize and underline that, it said that in the official statement, in relation to the upcoming GATT negotiations, they would include services, patents and foreign investment—but agriculture was missing. I accept the statement of the government leader. If it is on the agenda and Thomas Walkom is wrong, then more power to the government; but let us have it clear. Was that accomplished or was it not accomplished? Because I believe it is of major importance; and if it should happen that at the forthcoming GATT round it is not included, there will be grave disappointment among agricultural producers in Canada.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I suppose it depends on which part of Mr. Walkom's article the honourable senator chose to read. I will read another portion of it, which might give my honourable friend some comfort. It says:

According to officials, Mr. Mulroney, Mrs. Thatcher and U.S. President Ronald Reagan made strong pitches that the agricultural situation is getting out of hand.

British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney said yesterday that a decision to push for the inclusion of farm products has been taken.

That is with reference to the GATT performance. I agree with my friend. We are going to have to watch this thing and follow it carefully to see what happens; but I know very well that the Prime Minister of Canada will be in the forefront pushing for realistic action on this problem.

Senator Argue: So it is clear in the mind of my honourable friend that this item is on the GATT agenda?

Senator Roblin: That is what the newspaper article says to me.

Senator Argue: I thought the Leader of the Government was giving us this information as a member of the cabinet, and that he was not relaying to me something that was in a newspaper article—because I can do that myself. So I would ask the Leader of the Government again: Is it the information of the Leader of the Government, coming from the Prime Minister or his office, that this item of subsidized trade in agricultural products is, in fact, or will be, on the agenda for the GATT negotiations?

Senator Roblin: If my honourable friend will promise not to rely on newspaper clippings for his questions, I will promise not to rely on newspaper clippings for the answer. But I will say to my honourable friend that I can set his mind at rest. It is the opinion of the government that the agricultural question will be examined in two fora: (1) OECD, and (2) GATT.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—POINT OF ORDER

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport".—(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, in adjourning the debate yesterday, after having spoken to second reading of the bill, I said that I would do some more research and that I would discuss the matter with Senator MacEachen. In the course of my speech yesterday, I referred to a bill that was introduced back in 1977, namely, the Solar Energy Application Bill. I had a little difficulty in locating the bill, because I had not realized that it was that long ago—in fact, nine years ago. In the course of my speech I said:

There was a debate on my motion and at no time during that debate did anyone raise the question of whether or not it was proper to do so under our rules.

That is not correct because it was raised by Senator Argue and Senator Molson. Later I shall explain in more detail. At the end I said that my motion had been voted down by a narrow margin. That is not quite correct. The margin was 21 to 42.

● (1430)

Senator Argue: We understand what you mean.

Senator Roblin: That is better than I usually do.

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to go back before 1977 and outline how I got involved in this question. As a newcomer and one who had not previously been a parliamentarian, the Senate was completely new to me. On occasion, I would sit back and listen while we gave second reading to a bill—which was approval in principle—when I felt that we did not have all the facts upon which to give that approval. It was only on occasion, but I felt that it would be preferable to send such bills to committee so that the committee could examine it, hear witnesses, get the facts and report back to the Senate. The Senate would then be in a better position to decide whether or not it should approve the bill in principle. Unlike today, I was not thinking in terms of a faulty bill. I was merely thinking of obtaining more information for the Senate before it approved the bill in principle, so that it could act more intelligently. This is what was done in connection with the Corporate Shareholders Limitations Bill when witnesses such as Mr. Jacques Parizeau among others appeared before the committee, which was very helpful.

When I proposed my motion back in 1977 on the Solar Energy Application Bill, the purpose was to try to establish a precedent. I was not concerned over whether or not my motion would be defeated. I wanted to establish a precedent that could be relied upon in future. When I moved my motion at that time, I said, as it is reported in Debates of the Senate of May 26, 1977:

The effect of my motion will be that the bill will be taken off the order paper for the time being, it will stop the debate at this particular moment, but it will come back on to the order paper for debate on second reading at a later date when the committee makes its report.

Later in the same debate Senator Argue argued that what I was trying to do was out of order. He said:

That is an old trick. "Trick" is the wrong word, but it is an old method that is often used to kill a bill.

He went on to argue that what I was doing was designed to kill the bill, that the bill could not be brought back and so on. Senator McElman asked a couple of pertinent questions of Senator Argue. The exchange goes as follows:

SENATOR MCELMAN: If there were such a referral of the subject matter to committee, is there anything to prevent the committee from making a report and returning the bill to the house?

SENATOR ARGUE: I am subject to correction on these matters, but I would think that if we took this negative attitude it would preclude us under the rules from discussing the same type of bill in the same session.

SENATOR MCELMAN: But could the committee not return the same bill to the chamber?

SENATOR ARGUE: But we would have defeated the bill if we adopted this negative motion. In any event, that is my position; that is my understanding.

A little later on I got up again and said:

Honourable senators, I should like to point out that it was not my intention, in moving this motion, to kill the bill. I spoke to the Clerk this morning to determine the effect of such a motion. I was told that it would be perfectly in order and that the committee, when it reported back, would simply request that the bill be restored to the order paper to be proceeded with. The intention is not to kill the bill. The purpose of the motion is to enable us, when we continue the debate on second reading, to know more about what the bill will look like in its final form.

Then Senator Molson indicated that he had raised a point of order previously, and later on in the debate he insisted that the point of order be dealt with by the Speaker. His point of order was based on whether rule 94 of the Senate applied. We were dealing with a private member's bill and the question was whether it was a private member's public bill or just a private member's bill. Rule 94 reads:

After its first reading—

I would ask honourable senators to note the following words:

—and before its consideration by any other committee,— which would indicate that another committee could also consider a bill before first reading.

—a private bill from the House of Commons, for which no petition has been received by the Senate, shall be taken into consideration and reported on by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders in like manner as a petition.

Rule 94 makes it quite clear that it is contemplated that another committee could consider a bill after first reading. The Speaker went on to rule that what we were dealing with at that time was a public bill, even though it was introduced by a private member and that, therefore, rule 94 could not apply. When the Speaker gave her ruling, Senator Deschatelets, a former Speaker of the Senate, said:

Honourable senators, now that the ruling by Madam Speaker has disposed of the point of order raised by Senator Molson, it is clear that Senator Godfrey's motion in amendment is in order, and that it can be discussed on its merits. This means that the subject matter of this bill can be referred to a standing committee before the question is put for adoption of the bill on second reading.

I must say that when I heard those comments from a former Speaker of this house, I thought that we had finally established a principle, a convention—and after all we do not need to change the rules to establish a convention in this house—that we could use in the future.

In a discussion with Senator MacEachen, I told him that I had done this research and that I was sending him a copy of it. During that discussion Senator MacEachen insisted that the effect of my motion would be to defeat the bill, but he agreed that even though the bill was defeated it could be revived by a motion after it had been returned from committee and put back on to the order paper. I do not wish to get into an argument with Senator MacEachen on the question of semantics of whether the bill had been defeated and then revived. It is immaterial, as long as the bill can be brought back by a motion. Therefore, I would like to move the exact motion with the same wording that I moved on May 26, 1977—

Senator Stewart: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: You will never learn!

Senator Godfrey:—some nine years later. I move:

That the bill be not now—

The operative word here is “now”.

—read the second time but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the Senate Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for examination and report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that the question of whether this motion is in order is still in doubt. The decision Senator Godfrey referred to yesterday, which dealt with the orderliness of such a question, is, I believe, still appropriate and germane to the motion that is now before us.

● (1440)

Yesterday, Senator Godfrey sought to distinguish one decision made earlier because he said that it followed an earlier decision in which it was considered out of order to refer such a motion to a committee that did not exist. He suggested, therefore, that the more recent order is suspect, since we can assume that it was following that reasoning and, in this case, we now have a committee that does exist.

The difficulty with that line of reasoning is that the reasons given in the more recent decision were not based on that premise and were declared to be based on other grounds. The precedent cited today, of course, does not say that a motion of this kind is in order; it simply says that rule 94 does not apply because rule 94 only applies to a private member's private bill and not to a private member's public bill, which this is.

It seems to me that we should be sure of ourselves on the orderliness of this motion because I think an argument can be persuasively made that the question before the Senate, before this motion was made, is not: Shall we adopt the bill at second reading?—but: Shall the bill be read a second time? That is the question—

Senator Roblin: That is approval in principle.

Senator Frith: Yes, but that is the question. It is approval in principle, but the question before the Senate is: Shall this bill be read a second time? If the Senate therefore votes and adopts this motion and says: No, it shall not be read a second time—then in effect, it has dealt with the question in the negative and, on the question of whether the bill should be read a second time, the answer that the Senate gives is, “No,” but that the subject matter—and I wish to underline that; not the bill, not the question of second reading but the subject matter should be referred. The question, namely, “Shall it be read a second time?” will have been defeated, if we support this motion.

In that case—and this may be the consequence that honourable senators supporting the motion would want to bring about—rule 47 would apply. Rule 47 provides that:

(1) A motion shall not be made which is the same in substance as any question—

Honourable senators, you will notice that it says “question” and not “bill”— —which, during the same session, has been resolved in the affirmative or negative, unless the order, resolution, or other decision on such question has been rescinded as hereinafter provided.

If Your Honour agrees to make a ruling on this question, it seems to me that it is clear that the question: Shall the bill be read a second time?—if we support Senator Godfrey's motion—will have been answered in the negative.

In that event, I know of no rule that talks about restoring a bill to an order paper. However, that does not matter because we are not talking about the bill; we are talking about second reading of the bill. In other words, the bill itself could be restored, but as soon as it came up for second reading, someone could say: “We cannot deal with this. The second reading of this bill has already been resolved in the negative in this session, and therefore that vote can only be rescinded on five days' notice if at least two-thirds of the senators present vote in favour of its rescision.”

Therefore I think, honourable senators and Your Honour, that that aspect of this question should be ruled on. Senator Godfrey has made his arguments; I have raised the questions that I have raised, and I think it would be in order for Your Honour to give us a ruling on whether this question is in order and on whether the corollaries that I have suggested will flow from a vote in support of Senator Godfrey's motion are, indeed, correct.

Senator Godfrey: I would like to say a few words. As I pointed out, on the merits—and I am talking about the merits, not the legal technicalities—there is no question that it is desirable at certain times—

Senator Frith: The technicalities go against you.

Senator Godfrey: I am talking about the merits. If Senator Frith had been in the Senate back in 1961, Senator Hayden would never have had a chance to bring in this practice of referring to committee the subject matter of a bill, a practice which has been copied by the Australian Senate.

Senator Frith: But this has happened in the House of Commons.

Senator Godfrey: No, I am talking about the fact that it had never been done before. It was not in the rules. We started a convention and no one objected on a technicality in 1961. We have had the precedent here. In 1977, we went ahead, and now we come along with a technicality to try to block progress. That is the only way that I can describe it. Must we always be bound by pettifogging technicalities in this chamber when we have a precedent, nine years ago and since then,—

Senator Frith: There are bills in the House of Commons that have not been before us—

Senator Godfrey: The Corporate Shareholders' Limitation Bill, which we sent to a committee, was not a bill from the House of Commons; it was a Senate bill; we sent it there and no one bothered then to raise a technicality.

Furthermore, I thought I had a deal with Senator MacEachen. I would like a little loyalty from Senator Frith towards our leader, because Senator MacEachen agreed the matter could go back on the order paper. I would now like a little support from Senator MacEachen.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, perhaps I might say a few words on the point of order. I think the effect of the adoption of the motion should not be taken in the sense that was suggested by Senator Frith. It is quite simple: it is a question of logic; it is not a question of precedent with respect to something that might have been said in 1924 in the House of Commons.

When you say, "We do not want to decide on the principle of a bill now; we want to have further information and we will deal with the principle later," and if the Senate says, "Very well, we will do it," then it seems to me that there is no problem. The fact that the bill would not continue to be on the order paper does not make any difference. When we adopt a bill at second reading, for instance, and when the bill is referred to a committee, it disappears from the order paper and comes back with the report of the committee.

Senator Frith: Exactly.

Senator Flynn: Therefore, if we ask a committee to consider the subject matter of a bill, then at the time the committee makes a report on that bill, the bill comes back on the order paper. However, if that were the only problem, we have an example of how it was resolved in 1982 with Bill S-31. Bill S-31 was left on the order paper. At the suggestion of Senator Frith at the time, we decided to leave it on the order paper until the committee reported.

It seems to me that Senator Frith is trying to split hairs when he tries to give that meaning to the motion made by Senator Godfrey. The question is whether it is sensible to refer the subject matter, then have a report from the committee and then deal with the principle, once we have heard from the experts on this question of smoking or have considered the extent of the prohibition that is proposed in this bill. If it is sensible, it seems to me that we should not consider it on the basis of some decisions that were made a long time ago and which are not based upon any rule in our book of rules. You cannot find anything in our book of rules that relates to this matter. Also, we have had the precedent of Bill S-31 where the subject matter was referred to a committee with instructions to report. It was adopted unanimously at that time, and the only problem that arose was whether the bill should remain on the order paper, and we solved that.

But even if the technical effect was to take it off the order paper, it would be easy to consider that by reporting the bill the committee would revive that bill and place it back on the order paper as is done after second reading or at any other stage. In other words, the bill is referred to committee; it disappears from the order paper but it comes back with the report of the committee.

Therefore, I suggest that the amendment is quite in order, and that we should not exaggerate the complications.

[Senator Godfrey.]

• (1450)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it comes down to whether it is a good practice, as well as whether it is technically correct for the Senate to ask a committee to help it consider the principle of a bill. My contention is that it is not. Of course, we know that if we are opposed to something, then according to the other side the opposition is always the "pettifogging" hair-splitters, whereas, in fact, we are the ones dealing with the principle. I know that Your Honour in making a ruling will take into account my submissions as well as the eloquent contributions made by Senator Godfrey and Senator Flynn.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, for the recollection of His Honour and the edification of my colleagues, I remind them of that most important "Uncommon Law" decision given by Mr. Justice Wool, as he was then known, in that leading case of Haddock v. the Port of London Authority. In that case Mr. Justice Wool laid down a principle which we must all remember today: "There is no precedent for anything until it is done for the first time."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with such a difference of opinion, I think I shall take this under advisement and give my ruling at the next sitting of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-62, intituled: "An Act respecting employment equity".—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe this bill should be studied by a committee of the Senate both in general and specifically for the reasons advanced by Senator Marsden. Therefore, expecting as I do that Senator Robertson will move that the bill be referred to committee for study, I recommend that the bill be read a second time now.

The question is: Which committee? The bill could be referred to the Social Affairs Committee or the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. It seems to me that the subject matter of the bill falls within the mandate of either one of those committees. Sometimes, on an informal basis, we consult with the chairman of a committee to see what his or her views are, but perhaps Senator Robertson has already done that.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with respect to referring this bill to either of those two committees, yes, that has been considered. The conclusion is that this bill should be referred to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee.

Senator Frith: We support that.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Robertson speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, there has been some discussion regarding which committee the bill should be referred to. As the Leader of the Government has said, we think that the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee is the appropriate committee in the circumstances.

I have nothing further to say at this time. It is my intention to move that this bill be referred to that committee as soon as the question is put.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Robertson, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

TERRORISM

MOTION FOR APPOINTMENT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE— ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Sherwood:

That a Special Committee of the Senate be appointed to provide a forum to examine, consider, evaluate, consolidate and synthesize available research, documentation and other information relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians;

That the Committee identify any areas where further study, research or investigation is called for;

That the Committee examine and make recommendations on the role of the media in reporting terrorist threats and incidents;

That eight Senators, to be designated at a later date, act as members of the Special Committee; and

That the Committee present its report no later than December 19, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I had hoped to intervene in the debate on this matter today, but before doing so I wanted to consult with my colleagues to see if I could speak on behalf of any of them. I was unable to do so. Therefore, we will have to wait until next Tuesday or Wednesday, probably Wednesday, to deal with this matter.

Order stands.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

CONSIDERATION OF NINTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Message from the House of Commons regarding certain amendments to their Standing Orders), presented on Tuesday, May 6, 1986.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, on February 27 the House of Commons adopted a number of changes to its Standing Orders, and it was agreed to send a message to the Senate at that time, which we received on March 4. That message was referred immediately to the Standing Rules and Orders Committee, which proceeded to examine carefully the proposed changes.

I want to express my thanks to the House of Commons and, in particular, to the Government Leader in the House of Commons who had written to me previously advising me that these changes were being proposed. He subsequently wrote to the Leader of the Government in the Senate giving him more details on what the House proposed, and a copy of that letter was circulated to the members of the committee.

The changes that are proposed arise out of the McGrath committee report which studied the reform of the House of Commons. The effect is largely on the joint committees of both houses.

Possibly the simplest way to deal with the matter is to take the various points in the order in which they were dealt with in the original message from the House of Commons, which is basically, in any case, the way our proposed response is set up.

The first item in the message from the House of Commons was to advise the Senate of the new procedure that would be used in the House of Commons on the reporting of interparliamentary delegations. The committee looked at this and concluded that the present method used in the Senate is a method that we would prefer to continue. So, our response is simply to state that we note their practice and that our practice is as it exists now and that we simply do not propose any change. I really think that our practice in this regard is excellent. An honourable senator brings the matter up, and if any other honourable senator wishes to debate the matter, there is a debate; if not, the matter is concluded, but there is an opportunity given to honourable senators to debate the matter.

The next item is 2(a) which established a new joint committee, the Standing Joint Committee on Parliament. That proposed standing joint committee will replace the existing Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, the existing Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament and the existing Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament. The fact is that the Joint Committee on the Restaurant of Parliament has, in a sense, disappeared because the House of Commons has not included it in the past. So, this change, insofar as we are concerned—if we go along with this rule—would be to have one new committee to replace the three existing joint committees.

The discussion that went on in our committee was rather lengthy in this regard. This was probably the most controversial point of the message from the House of Commons. The problem is that there is a vast difference between the operation of the two houses. The structure of the House of Commons is such that the Speaker there has substantial administrative duties whereas here it is the Senate itself, through the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration, that has the administrative duties.

● (1500)

So, we had some difficulty in deciding exactly how this new committee would work with two different structures. But eventually, on the basis that it was a trial and on the basis that the proposed rule change in the House of Commons is only until the end of this year in any case, the committee agreed to go along with this proposition on the express condition that there be equal representation for the Senate and the House of Commons.

The House of Commons having decided, and having struck its committee with 12 members, the recommendation of the committee is that we appoint 12 senators, but, recognizing that a committee made up of 24 members is somewhat unwieldy, we propose that if the committee is to be reconstituted next year and the experiment continued, that it be reduced to 7 senators and 7 members of the House of Commons.

Our recommendation in that regard is to, in effect, cancel the three committees that we have had previously and replace them by one joint committee on Parliament.

There was some discussion in our committee as to what the rules of this committee would be, because we have to recognize that it can become a very important committee in relation to the functioning of this place and of the House of Commons, but we felt that with equality of membership from the two houses it was worth a trial. Obviously, the committee itself would have to establish its own rules, as committees normally do, but if there was equality of both houses, there should not be a disadvantage to either.

The next item was the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. As a result of a recommendation from that committee—in part at least—it is recommended that when that committee reports, if it reports that certain regulations be rescinded, and if it is within the authority of the government to rescind those regulations, the report of the committee would—if not turned down within 15 days—be deemed adopted. So, it would give substantial powers, in fact, to the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

This, as well, created a good deal of discussion within the committee as to the powers of the Houses of Parliament to order the government. But after considerable discussion it was agreed that this was also worthy of trial and our recommendation is that we agree to give that power to the committee through the Standing Order change.

The next item was simply a change in name, that the present Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages, Policy and Programs be renamed the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. We agreed to that.

Concerning the automatic referral of the report of the commissioner each year, it is our view that the present practice of the Senate is preferable whereby we make the reference. The report is made to us, and, instead of making an automatic referral as is proposed in the House of Commons, it would be done by motion, as has been our normal practice.

The next item was the structure of the Striking Committee in the House of Commons which would, immediately at the beginning of each session, nominate members within the first ten sitting days and set up the joint committees.

Again, the recommendation of the committee is that the Senate continue with its present rule which does not set a specific time. By and large, our rules and our practice here have been not to limit ourselves to any times concerning lengths of speeches or other matters. We operate on the basis of consensus. If this is going to work, it will mean that our committee responsible for establishing the membership of committees will have to work very quickly after the resumption of a session. I think this is a desirable practice in any case, but we do not recommend that there be a time limit as is recommended in the House of Commons.

The final item is the method of substitution of members on joint committees.

Again, it has been recommended in the House of Commons that there be a new method. We have looked at that and we felt that the practice which we followed in the past is acceptable and no change is required.

Coming back to the beginning of our ninth report, we recommend that rule 67(1) be amended by deleting all of the present joint committees and re-establishing the one on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments first, as being the first one created in chronological order, the Official Languages second, and the third one, the Joint Committee on Parliament, and renumbering all the other sections.

Honourable senators, I believe that the committee has done some useful work in this study. It is for a trial period as it relates to the House of Commons Standing Orders, because they expire at the end of the year. Ours are not based on the same rule. If the House of Commons re-establishes the order next year, we would not have to make any further changes in our rules with one exception: If it is agreed to continue with the Joint Committee on Parliament, and to reduce its number to seven members, we would have to make a change at that time.

I move the adoption of the report.

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Steuart, that this report be now adopted. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I have a comment to make in connection with the reference to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. In all logic, not only should the joint committee be able to recommend a disallowance of a regulation to the House of Commons, but it should also be able to recommend such disallowance to the Senate because, after all, we are equal.

To begin with, this is only a temporary matter until the end of the year—and I might say that there is quite a bit of faulty drafting in the rule in the House of Commons—but at least it is a joint committee on which senators are sitting, so some senators will have an input. It is not as much as, in all logic, it should be, but at least some senators are allowed an input as to whether or not they recommend that regulations should be disallowed.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I intend to adjourn the debate because there are one or two items in the report, which I saw for the first time yesterday, which have raised a question in my mind. One of them has already been adverted to by the last speaker. I think there is an important point here that needs to be clarified before I would be willing to give assent to the resolution as it now stands. So I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, that the debate be adjourned.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Before the adjournment takes place, I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee to clarify one point with regard to the Joint Committee on Parliament. I regret that, since my attention was diverted temporarily, I am not sure whether he covered this point which deals with the Joint Committee of Parliament whose jurisdiction will include the library, the restaurant, printing, distribution and the Parliamentary Relations Secretariat.

● (1510)

During the committee deliberations, we asked our advisers for an opinion as to whether this new committee would assist in administrative efficiency. We also asked what effect, if any, it would have on the jurisdiction and powers of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

On the first question, the feeling was that the situation would not improve overwhelmingly so far as efficiency were concerned.

On the second question, the main point which I wanted to put on the record, is that the opinion we received was that, since this proposed Joint Committee on Parliament would be an advisory committee, it would have no effect on the jurisdiction or powers of the Internal Economy Committee of the Senate. Would Senator Molgat confirm that understanding?

Senator Molgat: That is correct; that is the interpretation we received. As I outlined at the outset, there was a good deal of concern in the committee arising out of the different methods of operation of the two houses. There was concern as to what effect this would have on the Internal Economy Committee. At that time, the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders instructed me to write to the chairman of the Internal Economy Committee asking that committee to consider the whole question of whether there would be some effect on it.

Subsequently, Mr. Douglas Lewis, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader in the other place, appeared before our committee and indicated that the committee would serve in an advisory capacity only; and that the only estimates that would come before it would be the estimates of the Library of Parliament.

Therefore, we can see no effect on the work of the Internal Economy Committee of the Senate. It was on that basis and understanding that the committee agreed to proceed.

Insofar as the items under the mandate of this new committee are concerned, the message from the House of Commons refers to items that come under the joint jurisdiction of the two houses and other related matters as the committee deems fit. As you can see, this is a rather broad mandate which is part of the reason why our committee felt that the Senate must have equal membership. If the committee had the mandate to expand itself then there ought to be a limitation.

With regard to the precise items, I should like to refer to the letter from the Honourable Ray Hnatyshyn to the government leader in this chamber where he lists the following five items: printing; restaurants; Library of Parliament; distribution; and Parliamentary Relations Secretariat. It did not appear to us that any of this impinged on the work of the Internal Economy Committee.

Senator Roblin: I should like to ask a supplementary question on the point raised by Senator Frith. When Senator Molgat says that it does not impinge on the work of the Internal Economy Committee, I presume he means that the parliamentary committee will not be a budgetary committee and will not make levies on the budget of the Senate. I want to be quite clear that that is the case.

Senator Molgat: Based on the responses given to us by Mr. Lewis and on the subsequent letter, I would say that that is the case.

However, I would remind honourable senators of the statement in paragraph 2(a) which says, "... and other related matters as the Committee deems fit." It seemed to me that the point which concerned many senators was that the committee might deem fit at later times to expand its mandate.

At the moment, that is certainly not the intention. Except for those of the Library of Parliament, it is not expected that any other estimates will be referred to that committee and it is not expected to have budgetary powers.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I do not want this to become a debate out of time, but I have a further question I should like answered.

We made certain reservations in this report where we did not entirely agree with the Commons in terms of the number of senators and other points. Was any consideration given to reserving our position on the budgetary question so that we would be quite clear that this parliamentary committee would not have the powers that I think may accrue to it in due time?

Perhaps that point was discussed in committee. If so, could the chairman tell us whether it was discussed or not and what decision was made?

Senator Molgat: I do not recall any specific recommendations in that regard. There was concern, and part of the reason I assumed that members of the committee insisted on equal representation was to ensure that nothing could be done without the acquiescence of the senators.

There was also concern on the basis that, in any case, this is a temporary measure because the Standing Order of the House of Commons ceases at the end of this year. Therefore, there was a double protection. We did not insert a specific budget restriction although, when questions were asked of Mr. Lewis specifically on the matter of estimates, he responded that it would apply only to the Library of Parliament estimates. Insofar as the committee's mandate was concerned, Mr. Lewis, in his letter of May 1, stated:

I wish to reiterate that the Committee would function as an overview or advisory committee rather than a management committee,—

Based on that, the committee felt there was no possibility of going beyond that matter. However, I would repeat that there was concern, and the committee members recommended that we protect the position of the Senate by ensuring equality and the fact that it was on a temporary basis—

Senator Roblin: Temporary arrangements tend to become permanent.

Senator Molgat: Sorry, I didn't get that.

Senator Roblin: Temporary arrangements tend to become permanent.

On motion of Senator Roblin, debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator McElman, in whose name Order No. 5 stands, has agreed that I may ask leave to consider Order No. 6 provided I am not too lengthy.

Although Order No. 6 stands in Senator Flynn's name, I ask permission to speak to it at this time since I have to leave the chamber by 3:30 p.m. Senator Flynn and I have consulted and he has an amendment which we have agreed upon. I am not asking that it be passed, but I would like to take this opportunity to say that I support the amendment. Perhaps he may be allowed to simply put the amendment and then the order can stand.

Senator Roblin: What on earth can it be that you two have agreed upon?

Senator Frith: Something that follows on a suggestion of yours.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 77(7) TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT COMMITTEE MEETINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

"(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees."—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, if you refer to the Senate Debates of May 1, you will see it is more a problem of semantics.

The Committee on Standing Rules and Orders had been asked to look into the possibility of prohibiting smoking during committee meetings. The committee has now presented a report, suggesting that the rules be amended to prohibit smoking at meetings of Senate committees.

As we all know, traditionally smoking has not been permitted, but only in the Senate chamber. I thought it would be more logical, since the committee had a mandate to go beyond the customs prevailing in the Senate, to have the text specify that smoking is prohibited in the Senate as well.

Senator Frith agrees with me, and I therefore move that the proposed wording for rule 77(8) be amended to read as follows:

Smoking is prohibited at meetings of the Senate and its committees.

● (1520)

[English]

My amendment would change paragraph 8 of rule 77 by saying:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at meetings of the Senate and of its committees.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after rule 77(7), the following:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.

In amendment, it is moved by Senator Flynn that:

(8) Smoking is prohibited at meetings of the Senate and of its committees.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would suggest that rather than adopt it, we should give honourable senators the opportunity to consider the logic or merit of the amendment and that the motion and the motion in amendment should stand until next week.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Why not move the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Frith: That is what I mean.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS"—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to participate in this important debate. Over the past couple of years the controversy over the film about Billy Bishop, namely, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", has involved many thousands of Canadians and has evoked very considerable coverage and editorial comment by leading Canadian journals. Canadian Forces veterans and their families, and veterans' organizations in particular, have been deeply offended by the message disseminated through this film, and they have questioned just who, in Parliament, speaks on behalf of the veterans of our Armed Forces, and, on this issue, who speaks in defence of the late Billy Bishop and the thousands of other veterans who were decorated for courage and valour by a grateful nation. By reason only of the aging process, each Parliament, particularly in the House of Commons, has fewer and fewer veterans and others who have lived through and who have a personal understanding of the horrors of World War II. By that reason alone, in Parliament it is the Senate that more than ever must assume the role of guarding the interests of our veterans. So, in this instance, when the question is asked, "Who speaks for Bishop and other decorated veterans, both living and dead?", I am pleased and proud that the answer is: "The Senate speaks for them."

At the outset I wish to extend my congratulations to our colleague, the Honourable Senator Hartland Molson, who instigated the inquiry by the Senate into this film. Senator Molson, himself a distinguished veteran of the RCAF No. 1 Fighter Squadron in World War II, and one who knew the late Air Marshal William Avery Bishop personally, quite properly initiated this inquiry, and the Senate, quite properly, approved its reference to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. That committee and the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs are to be commended for the quality of their report to the Senate, the subject matter of this debate. In all of the circumstances, they are further to be commended for the real element of restraint they have shown in the body of the report and its single minimal recommendation.

Honourable senators who have already spoken in the debate have enumerated the many errors of fact and chronology and the misrepresentations by manipulated fiction contained in the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss". I will not elaborate further on those, except to say that in their totality they constitute a deliberate and major attack by means of disinformation and revisionism against the honoured name of one of Canada's most renowned, decorated and revered military heroes—and all of this some 60 years after the event, by one who is not an historian, nor an experienced researcher. I refer to Mr. Paul Cowan of the National Film Board.

It would appear that this film, in all of its aspects, was almost a one-man effort on his part.

At page 4 of the committee's report it states that Mr. Cowan "researched, wrote, produced, directed and co-edited 'The Kid Who Couldn't Miss'".

The report goes on to state that Mr. Cowan "was not experienced in making documentaries about historical subjects although he was well-versed in all aspects of film making."

Furthermore, on page 4 and 5 of the committee's report, honourable senators will find the following:

On the basis of the film credits, it does not seem that Mr. Cowan consulted important collections of documents relating to the air war and to Bishop's participation in it. The British Public Records Office which contains important documentation is not listed, nor is the Directorate of History, Department of National Defence in Canada, which holds the most voluminous records on Bishop and other Canadians who served with the Royal Flying Corps. When asked why he had consulted British experts and witnesses to the exclusion of most Canadian sources, Mr. Cowan replied, "I didn't feel that anybody here that I know of, in any case, had anything to add to it except to say, 'Well, the official history says that he did it'."

Honourable senators, those elements of the report, together with the general tenor of Mr. Cowan's testimony before the committee, leave me with the distinct impression that Mr. Cowan was not competent to be left almost entirely on his own by the National Film Board to research, write, produce, direct and co-edit this film.

He is, however, a proven and experienced film maker. He developed a notion or concept of the kind of film that he wished to make. His thesis was that the highest authorities, both military and civil, responsible for the conduct of a war, would fraudulently create war heroes as part of their planning to maintain public and general service support for the continuing war effort, and that serving military personnel would consciously and fraudulently concoct information to make heroes of themselves.

So Mr. Cowan searched for information, rumour and innuendo to support his theme. He found what he sought mostly in Britain, and he ignored information and sources that did not support his thesis—sources readily available both in Britain and in Canada. He even manufactured damning evidence, by his own admission, to put in the mouth of an actor who portrayed Bishop's mechanic, Bourne; and to support his cynical thesis about war, about civil and military authority, about the Crown and about the making of heroes, he found it useful to sully the record of valour, the dearly earned decorations, the personal integrity and the revered memory of Billy Bishop—and, by extension, it is also an attack upon each and every Canadian veteran who was decorated for bravery in action. So Mr. Cowan was permitted to complete and circulate within Canada and internationally this slyly destructive piece of cynical propaganda. He has been permitted to do so by the National Film Board with its substantial financial support throughout and its continuing support through distribution and promotion.

● (1530)

Honourable senators, this brings us to the crux of this whole matter—the responsibility of the National Film Board. The mandate of the National Film Board has been analyzed and described in various ways by the Government Film Commissioner, Mr. Macerola. There is, however, a mandate established for the film board in law by the National Film Act. It is broad and yet specific. Section 9 of that act under the heading "Purposes of the Board" reads in part as follows:

The board is established to initiate and promote the production and distribution of films in the national interest and in particular,

(a) to produce and distribute and to promote the production and distribution of films designed to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations;

There are other provisions that are not directly relevant to the subject of this debate.

Honourable senators, I question most seriously and strenuously whether the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" falls within the provisions of that mandate. I do not believe that the production and distribution of a film that defames the record and memory of Billy Bishop can be considered to be in the national interest. I cannot accept that the production of such a film, which, by extension, calls into question the award of honours by our nation for courage in combat by thousands of other service veterans can possibly be considered as an appropriate way "to interpret Canada to Canadians and to other nations", in the words of the National Film Act. I believe that the National Film Board was wrong to permit Mr. Cowan to alter so drastically his original and approved proposal for this film. I believe that the Film Board was doubly wrong to permit itself to become the willing supporter and sponsor of such a damnable insensitive treatment of what is an emotionally sensitive subject to countless thousands of Canadians.

Even the most shallow and superficial consideration by the Film Board should have convinced it that such a film would needlessly offend every veteran's organization in the country, as it should and as it did. And to what purpose? To satisfy the wish, the desire of the film maker to develop and disseminate an obviously provocative and unacceptable attack upon the reputation and memory of one of the nation's greatest heroes, as well as to bring into question the award of decorations and honours to thousands of other Canadian service veterans. That, in my view, was a dreadful and regrettable error in judgment on the part of the National Film Board.

Having said that, let me hasten to add that I believe this instance to be an aberration in an otherwise excellent record of service to Canadians by the National Film Board. The inventory of the Film Board is replete with hundreds, even thousands of films of superb quality, both in content and in technical terms. In one's anger over this one film, it must not be forgotten that the Film Board has produced commendable film biographies of such people as W.O. Mitchell, Margaret Laurence and Farley Mowatt, to mention a few. The film, "The Portrait of Wilder Penfield" reminded Canadians of the extraordinary contribution to our nation by this world-renowned neurosurgeon, philosopher, teacher and humanitarian.

As a militant Maritimer, I have enjoyed immensely the films, "Alex Colville—Realist Painter" and, "The Life of Miller Brittain." The latter film is a case in point. The late Mr. Brittain was a war artist, and upon his return to his native Saint John, New Brunswick, his extraordinary works shocked the artistic community before they achieved final acclaim. He led a tortured life filled with personal problems and tragedy, but the film dealt with all this with laudable sensitivity and was laudably well done by the National Film Board. They felt no necessity to destroy the man.

Then there are the excellent films of controversial subjects, such as "Not a Love Story" a film about pornography and, "If You Love This Planet", a film on nuclear disarmament. These films are only a few, a very few, of the outstanding productions for which the Film Board has earned great acclaim and awards over the many years. It should be emphasized that in none of these and countless other films of quality has the producer found it useful or necessary to blacken the reputation and memory of any individual to make his point or to develop his personal bias, as was the case in the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss."

So now we have a situation where the hard-earned and good reputation of the National Film Board itself is being sullied by this one incident, and that is most unfortunate. Yet the Film Board has permitted this controversy to continue for more than two years without remedy. Now, they appear to believe that a simple change of category from the original designation of documentary to that of docu-drama will cure the situation and assuage the angry protests of veterans' organizations and thousands of individual citizens, as well as the Senate of Canada. Well, it just won't wash.

The Film Board has had trouble from the outset deciding upon a category for this film. That is not surprising. In its annual report for fiscal 1982-83 at page 11 it referred to "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" as an "interpretive biography of Canada's legendary war ace, Billy Bishop." Honourable senators, it would strain the credulity of any reasonable person to call this film a biography. In its annual report for fiscal 1983-84 at page 15, the Film Board refers to the film as "a portrayal of Billy Bishop." Again, it does not strike me as a proper reference to this film. Further in that report, at page 20 it states that the film was awarded the Silver Hugo at Chicago's nineteenth International Film Festival where it was "voted best documentary." One must assume that it was submitted in that category by the Film Board. Moving on to the Film Board's annual report of 1984-85, the most recent report, there is the first reference at pages 8 and 9 that I could find to the term "docu-drama." This reference is not related to the film in question, but is rather the board's definition of docu-drama which is: "A genre which hovers somewhere between documentary and fiction." Hovers indeed!

● (1540)

Further on in that report comes the revelation at page 40 that at the 1st International Aeronautic and Space Film Festival at Chateau-d'Oex, Switzerland the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" finally found its place, its proper category. It was awarded the "Silver Balloon" in the category: "Full-length or Short Fiction Film." Honourable senators, could it be that the National Film Board submitted this film in the category of "fiction"? In any event, that is not what they have indicated to us. I suggest they must have had to submit it in that category. If not, it certainly shows that the judges were truly perceptive in their consideration of it.

Honourable senators, I come now to the public reaction to the hearings and the report of our Senate committee by Mr. Cowan and by Mr. Adam Symansky, co-editor of the film. In an article by Mr. Cowan, published in the Toronto Star on April 17, he said:

The film will be labelled a docu-drama. It will not be shelved. It will not be re-cut.

In the same article, Mr. Cowan stated:

When we do make films critical of established beliefs, we are, of necessity, walking a tightrope between freedom of expression and the abuse of a sacred privilege.

Honourable senators, I suggest that, in the making of this film, Mr. Cowan fell off his tightrope on the latter side.

On April 16, the Montreal Gazette published a story under the heading: "Movie-maker opposed to disclaimer by Bishop film." The story included the following:

Executive producer Adam Symansky said in an interview before the report was made public that he would not approve any wording which labelled the film, or its parts, fiction.

Honourable senators, it seems to me that both Mr. Cowan and Mr. Symansky are somewhat presumptuous in making statements of such finality. I should think that, in the face of the controversy that has raged in the public over this film for some two years or more, and that has now been made the subject of an inquiry in Parliament by the Senate of Canada, resulting in such a critical report, the matter would be taken under consideration by the full board of directors of the National Film Board. I believe they can now do no less in the public interest. Neither Mr. Cowan nor Mr. Symansky is a member of that board. Mr. Macerola, the Government Film Commissioner, is chairman of the board.

Section 4(1) of the National Film Act provides for a board appointed by the Governor in Council with eight members in addition to the chairman:

—three of whom shall be selected from the public service of Canada or the Canadian Forces, and five of whom shall be selected from outside the public service and Canadian Forces.

I would comment that, if the former government in its appointments, or the present government in its appointments, had included a prominent member or members of the Canadian forces, we probably would not have had to deal with this matter.

In any event, there is now a full board in place, with some old appointments and some more recent appointments. Perhaps they have considered this matter. We have really no way of knowing. However, the Minister of Communications does know, if the provisions of the National Film Act have been complied with. Section 8 of that act reads as follows:

8. The Chairman shall furnish a copy of the minutes of each meeting of the Board to the Minister.

If the board has not yet carefully considered or reconsidered this matter in the light of our committee's report, the minister will no doubt wish to give direction to the board as provided for in the National Film Act.

That, then, leads us to a consideration of the National Film Act and possible action that could be taken by the Senate, in light of some of the extraordinary provisions of that act. I believe it to be important that we take note of the difference in the legislation which governs the National Film Board in comparison with that governing other agencies, such as the CBC and the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission, or CRTC. Both of these bodies are governed by the Broadcasting Act. That act provides for limited circumstances in which the Governor in Council may give direction or orders to the CBC and the CRTC. Each of those agencies does submit an annual report to the Secretary of State who, in turn, causes the report to be laid before Parliament.

Traditionally, the government of the day has carefully maintained an arm's length relationship with the CRTC and the CBC, as designed in the Broadcasting Act.

The National Film Act provides for a quite different method for governing the activities of the NFB. By law, it is not an arm's length situation but very much a "hands on" situation, despite the protestations of National Film Board witnesses before the Senate committee.

Let me refer specifically to two sections of the National Film Act, which is Chapter N-7, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1970. Section 3, under the heading "Responsibility of Minister"—which means the Minister of Communications—reads as follows:

3. For the purposes of this Act and subject to its provisions, the Minister shall control and direct the operations of the National Film Board.

That is pretty all-encompassing. The designated minister, as I have said, is the Minister of Communications. At the time of this study by the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, the Acting Minister of Communications was the Honourable Benoit Bouchard, Secretary of State. The present Minister of Communications is, of course, the Honourable Marcel Masse.

Honourable senators, I cannot stress too much what section 3 says. Perhaps I should read it again:

3. For the purposes of this Act and subject to its provisions, the Minister shall control and direct the operations of the National Film Board.

That, however, is not the full extent of it. Section 10(1) under the heading "Powers of Board" reads as follows:

10. (1) Subject to the direction and control of the Minister, the Board may, for the purposes for which it is established,—

And then there follow nine subsections elaborating the powers of the board, "subject to the direction and control of the minister." Therefore, the power of direction and control by the Minister of Communications over the NFB is all-encompassing. It is now clear why the Government Film Commissioner, Mr. Francois Macerola, sought and obtained the permission of the Acting Minister of Communications before he, Mr. Macerola, and officials of the NFB accepted the request of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs to appear and testify before it. It should be noted that the chairman of the CRTC or the president of the CBC would not have required such ministerial permission. Yet, the Film Commissioner, Mr. Cowan and others continue to invoke an imaginary "arm's length from government" protective shield against any criticism of their activities, such as in the matter of the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss".

Honourable senators, it appears to me that the course to be followed by the Senate is becoming clear. As we know, the Senate should not attempt to amend the report of one of its committees.

● (1550)

It can, of course, return a report to a committee with direction, which is not an unusual practice. I would suggest that it would be appropriate at the conclusion of this debate that the Senate approve a motion or resolution to the effect that a copy of this report, as it now stands, or as it may be amended by the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, be formally submitted to the Honourable Marcel Masse, Minister of Communications, with the request that he formally transmit that report to the National Film Board with his specific instruction of action to be taken by that board to right the wrong that it has done to the memory of and respect for the late Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, V.C.

Honourable senators, although the Honourable Marcel Masse is known properly as a staunch defender of the arts, he is also known as a fair and responsible minister. I am confident that he would, as did the committee, consider that the one recommendation of the committee in its report is the minimum action required to be taken by the National Film Board. He may, indeed, believe that the Film Board should be required to take further corrective action.

If he should consult with and seek the advice of his cabinet colleagues, I am confident also that he would be given valuable support from many of them. I think of three in particular, all distinguished veterans of World War II: the Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Honourable Duff Roblin, the Honourable George Hees, Minister of Veterans Affairs, and the Honourable Erik Nielsen, Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of National Defence.

Indeed, we have clear evidence of the very strong feelings of the Honourable Erik Nielsen in the matter of this film. On February 15, 1984, at the height of the public controversy stirred up by the release of the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", Mr. Nielsen wrote to the then Minister of Communications, the Honourable Francis Fox, and, according to a column published by Mr. Ron Lowman of the Toronto Star in its edition of February 23, 1986, said, in part, in that letter:

Names like Bishop, Collishaw, Barker and Brown live on, not because they wanted it that way, but because their contemporaries—British and American, as well as Canadians—knew that they were the best.

For the Canadian government to put its imprimatur on a film that sneers at the courage and accomplishments of these men from the security of a film studio is mean-spirited and hollow. It is a narrow-minded and ugly way of registering disapproval of all they stood for . . .

At least leave us our heroes.

Men like Bishop and the others live on in the hearts of their fellow Canadians. No cheap and sleazy attack can undermine what they did and what they stood for . . .

This mean, grubby attempt to slur great Canadians should be disavowed publicly by the government and there should be a public apology by the responsible minister as well as an official disclaimer any time this miserable production is shown.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, the Honourable Erik Nielsen said it all and said it well.

The minister in the former government did not act as requested by the Royal Canadian Legion, other veterans' organizations and numerous outraged citizens, including Mr.

[Senator McElman.]

Nielsen. I would hope and anticipate that the Honourable Marcel Masse will take firm and appropriate action if formally requested to do so by the Senate of Canada.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Molson, debate adjourned.

TRANSPORTATION OF DANGEROUS GOODS REGULATIONS

REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Sixth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications (Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations), tabled on 19th February, 1986.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Honourable senators, the committee has considered the subject matter of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations, and tabled its report on the subject on February 19, 1986.

I had intended to move the adoption of this report before today, but unfortunately, I had to postpone this for two months because of health reasons.

You will recall this was not the first time the committee undertook a study of the subject. Under an order of referral dated October 21, 1980, the committee had commenced consideration of draft regulations for the transportation of dangerous goods. At the time, it held fifteen public meetings and heard several witnesses, including officials from the Department of Transport. It subsequently decided to suspend its meetings because the draft regulations it was considering were undergoing a thorough revision. In the circumstances, the committee felt it was impossible to submit a final report on the subject.

Since then, the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations were adopted by Order in Council dated January 17, 1985. The committee was then given a new order of reference, dated February 14, 1985. It resumed its study and tabled the report we are considering today. The committee held ten public meetings. The Minister of Transport and departmental officials appeared before the committee. Officials from the Department of Highways and Transportation of Saskatchewan appeared to present the views of this province before the committee. The committee also heard a number of agencies from the public and private sector and received several letters from provincial and territorial governments.

The Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations are aimed at encompassing all transport modes in a single set of uniform regulations. They apply to the marine, air, rail and road modes. The regulations have been in effect for transport modes under the jurisdiction of Parliament since July 1, 1985. The Transportation of Dangerous Goods Regulations also apply to transport modes governed by the provinces and the territories, since the latter jurisdictions have adopted appropriate legislation. The effective date of the regulations with respect to transport modes not federally regulated has varied between July 1, 1985 to February 1, 1986. However, as far as Yukon was concerned, the effective date at the time the committee's report was being drafted was April 1, 1986. For various reasons, Yukon has had to extend the deadline and it is now expected the regulations will become effective this summer.

The regulations do not only apply to the transportation of dangerous goods by a commercial enterprise. Any person who handles, offers for transport or transports such goods is subject to the regulations unless an exemption is specifically provided. For instance, there is an exemption, under certain conditions, for consumers purchasing goods of this nature at retail establishments.

Briefly, the regulations provide for a system of classifying dangerous goods and require that such goods be accompanied by certain documents and that safety marks be placed on the goods and the vehicles transporting them. Certain safety standards and rules must be observed, and reports must be made in case of an accident. Persons not residing in Canada must appoint a Canadian agent if they engage in activities connected with dangerous goods in Canada. The regulations also deal with the procedure to be followed when the Minister or a person designated by him issues an order to cease and desist from an activity connected with dangerous goods or to conduct such an activity in an orderly fashion. It also indicates the procedure to be followed when applying for an exemption or equivalence permit. Finally, it defines the jurisdiction and duties of inspectors.

I might point out that, concerning the personnel responsible for enforcing the road transport regulations, negotiations are being held by the various government levels with a view to reaching an agreement under which the extensive and existing provincial resources will be responsible for enforcing the regulations. This should enable us to avoid creating another federal body to do that job. The committee is encouraged to see that negotiations seem to be progressing, and it emphasizes the importance of concluding an agreement in this field.

Let us now deal with the points on which the committee thought it would be necessary to make recommendations.

Two of the committee recommendations relate to the need to make the regulations more readily accessible. First of all, the regulations are very complex, and it is unlikely that all those who are governed by them will become familiar with the regulatory requirements simply by consulting the regulations. The Department of Transport has already published information brochures for the industry. However, as we have already pointed out, these regulations apply not only to the industry but also to consumers. This is why the committee recommended, and I quote:

That comprehensive information programs be developed by the Department of Transport to make the contents of the regulations known to people outside the industry.

The regulations have been amended several times since their adoption and can therefore be found in a number of separate documents. The committee thought they would be a lot easier to consult if the amended version were contained in a single document. This service is offered by the private sector, but in English only. Therefore the committee recommended, and I quote:

That an office consolidation of the regulations (in both official languages) be prepared by the Department of Transport and made available to the public as soon as possible.

Incidentally, I may add that the Minister of Transport recently announced an office consolidation will soon be available.

To get back to the report, representations were made to the committee to have the regulations amended so that truck drivers and railway companies using water transportation services be under a legal duty to disclose ahead of time to the master of the ship the content of their cargoes. This would improve public safety, since it would be helpful when deciding where to position vehicles so that there should be the least possible harm in the event of an accident. The evidence the committee gathered in this regard does not disclose any conclusive reason why such a requirement should not be implemented. Thus the committee recommended, and I quote:

That the Regulations be amended to require truck operators and railway companies to give to the master of the ship advance notice of the contents of their cargoes where they intend to use water transport service in the routing of a shipment containing dangerous goods.

Finally, the committee considered specific areas of concern in relation to the aftermath of an accident involving dangerous goods. It expressed concern about limitation of liability clauses which may, under certain conditions, be used by masters and operators of ships under the Canada Shipping Act (Sections 647 to 655). It also recalled that section 19(1) of the Transportation of Dangerous Goods Act authorizes the Minister to require any person who engages in transporting dangerous goods to provide evidence of financial responsibility in the form of insurance or any other form satisfactory to the department. No evidence of the kind is required at this time. In the United States for instance, the requirement does exist. Depending on the goods transported, the amount required varies from one million to five million dollars. However, the committee heard testimony from representatives of the Insurance Bureau of Canada and was informed that at the present time, the industry was in no position to offer insurance policies for amounts exceeding one million dollars. Furthermore, these representatives reminded the committee that the insurance policies available contained exclusion clauses for accidents involving pollution. Taking into account these circumstances, the committee recommended, emphasizing that it was merely a temporary solution as far as committee members were concerned, and I quote:

That evidence of financial responsibility up to $1 million be required from persons who engage or propose to engage in handling, offering for transport or transporting dangerous goods, in the form of insurance or any other form satisfactory to the Minister of Transport.

In that respect the committee also recommended:

That persons engaged in handling, offering for transport or transporting dangerous goods be required to keep with them evidence of their financial responsibility and to show it to enforcement personnel on request.

In its conclusions on the study of the regulations governing transportation of dangerous goods, the committee points out that the final version of this document, which was drafted over several years, is not yet ready. It is very complex, certain parts are still at the drafting stage, and another part will be added in the future. The committee does not question the wisdom of the decision to enforce the regulations in spite of that. Indeed committee proceedings on this subject are full of testimonies indicating that the regulations are very likely to improve public safety. Undoubtedly certain incidents have prompted the government to enforce them despite the fact that satisfactory solutions are still to be found concerning some problems, among others the financial responsibility of people involved in activities related to dangerous goods. The fact that the regulations are enforced should now be an incentive to solve the problems on which the committee reported.

On motion of Senator Langlois, report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Tuesday, May 13, 1986, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Before the motion is put, honourable senators, I might, as a word of explanation, state that with Bill C-62 having been referred to committee we have no further government business before the Senate.

We anticipate that the House of Commons will dispose of two items on Friday, Bill C-107 and Bill C-108, and that we shall deal with those next week.

Now, honourable senators, for the good news. Committees will meet tomorrow as scheduled. Those committees will include: the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations; the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration; the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs; the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments; and the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until Tuesday, May 13, 1986, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

PRIVILEGE

STATEMENT BY SENATOR ROBLIN ON ALLEGED CONFLICT OF INTEREST

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I should like to raise a question of privilege before we proceed to our business this afternoon. I wish to bring to the notice of the Senate that at a press conference in Montreal this morning an allegation was made that I had a conflict of interest with respect to security contracts that Air Canada has recently awarded to two security companies.

Senator Frith: Who made that allegation?

Senator Roblin: That allegation was made, I understand, by a trade union official at a press conference in Montreal this morning.

I think it my duty to tell the Senate what the facts are and I am going to do so by reading a letter I have written to the Minister of Transport under whose jurisdiction this matter falls.

My letter is dated today and reads as follows:

I would like to clarify with you my alleged association with Metropol Airport Security Services Ltd. and Metropol Base-Fort Airport Security Services Ltd. who have been asked to take the place of Burns Security Ltd. in providing airport security services for Air Canada.

I am informed that these two companies are limited partnerships and I advise that I have no interest whatsoever in them.

The names of these two limited partnerships are similar to that of Metropol Security Limited of Winnipeg in which I formerly held an interest. I disposed of my interest approximately six years ago.

I am aware, however, that my wife has a continuing interest in Metropol Security Ltd. and that is why it is important to note that neither she nor I have any interest in the two limited partnerships to which the security contracts have been awarded.

The two limited partnerships were established by other shareholders of Metropol Security Ltd. in order to take on the work in question and I am informed that the two partnerships will be operated on a self-contained basis.

The gist of that letter, honourable senators, is that the contracts have been awarded to two companies in which neither I nor my wife has any interest whatsoever, so I think I may fairly say I have observed both the letter and the spirit of any conflict of interest rules that pertain to this chamber.

I felt it my duty to let this house have my statement at the earliest date in case it should become a matter of controversy.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

UNITED NATIONS FOREIGN ARBITRAL AWARDS CONVENTION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-107, to implement the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

COMMERCIAL ARBITRATION BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-108, relating to commercial arbitration.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading later this day.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since leave is being asked to proceed with second reading later this day and since it is our intention to give that leave respecting both of these bills, I should like to say for the record that when the bills are spoken to I think it will be apparent that there is good reason for dealing with these bills promptly. I wanted it understood that leave is not being granted cavalierly. There is good reason for doing so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources have power to sit at three o'clock in the afternoon on Thursday next, May 15, 1986, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

The Hon the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

OIL AND GAS INDUSTRY LAYOFFS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. It has to do primarily with the continuing severely high number of layoffs in the energy sector, particularly that part of it concerned with gas and oil.

Can the Leader of the Government tell us today, or will he undertake to find out from the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, when the government is going to take some action to stem the tide of layoffs taking place in Calgary? The layoffs are continuing, at the average rate of approximately 100 per day, of people who had what they thought was permanent employment. Of course, the main reason is that no investment is being made because of the lack of confidence that there will be a reasonable return on that investment. That again follows from the government's stated intention to deregulate the industry, which in turn means that investors no longer have any confidence that there will be any opportunity of having a reasonable return on their investment.

● (1405)

Can the Leader of the Government give us an indication as to when the government will assume its responsibility and start governing this country in such a way that there will be a future for such sectors as those concerned with gas and oil? I could make the same argument for a number of other sectors, including forestry and agriculture, but today I am concerned primarily with the energy sector, because that is where the most severe reduction in employment, and the loss of income that goes with that reduction, is causing severe difficulties. Despite announcements that have been made in the past few days, there has been no stemming or slowing down in the rate of layoffs taking place in that industry.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I appreciate the seriousness of the situation to which my honourable friend refers. It is, indeed, a very serious one. I think that the situation concerning agriculture is even worse. Therefore the strain on the resources of the Canadian government is obvious.

One would have to look at both levels of government with respect to oil. The federal government has taken significant steps to improve the cash flow of those companies engaged in the oil business, and I have no doubt that the Province of Alberta is also considering measures it might proceed with, because of the large proportion of the tax revenues derived from that industry that accrue to the provincial administration.

I can inquire of my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, as to whether there is anything further that I can tell my friend, but I have nothing more at the moment.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I could not agree more that both levels of government are deeply involved in this matter. A few days ago, when the people of Alberta had an opportunity to speak, they indicated very clearly what they thought about the provincial government's action. Whatever the number of seats may have been, the popular vote changed by probably well over 25 per cent, which is a massive switch. In some areas, where previously there had never been an NDP or Liberal elected for approximately 50 years, a number of them were elected, and there were a whole lot more who came close. I have no disagreement regarding the fact that the provincial government has a very heavy responsibility, but I was being more specific in directing my question. I am not sure that the people expect massive subsidies from the treasury, such as my honourable friend spoke about, whether federal or provincial. What they want this government to do is to govern, to assume its responsibility and to set up policies that perhaps do not require transfers out of either the federal or provincial treasury, and not leave the policy that dictates the well-being of that sector to some phantom thing called the world market, because he and I, and the people in Alberta who are directly involved, know that there is no such thing. Someone out in the international field, perhaps Saudi Arabia and a number of other countries are setting the policy; they are making political decisions, the consequences of which affect our oil and gas sector.

What I want to know and what these people want to know is when this government intends to start to implement the policies that need to be implemented and to formulate the necessary regulations so that investors can have some confidence in the future, rather than leaving the matter completely to decisions made in the Persian Gulf or somewhere else in the world. They want the Government of Canada to govern Canada.

● (1410)

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, if my honourable friend has some constructive ideas in this respect, why does he not introduce a motion in the house and we can discuss it?

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, perhaps I will do that. However, whether or not we have a discussion in this house, it is still up to the government that was duly elected to govern in such a way that the people of this country, including those who are employed in the gas and oil industry, can believe that it is facing up to its responsibilities. Perhaps the honourable minister really does have to defer to his colleagues to find out whether they intend to start governing, and if so when.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that the government's record in this particular field is clear. We have taken the most drastic measures ever taken in the oil and gas industry in deregulating it, which has had a very beneficial effect on the industry. I think that this policy is still benefiting the industry, in spite of the fact that prices have fallen so low. The government has also introduced other measures that will improve the cash flow of the industry, and we are doing the very best we can. If my honourable friend has non-tax or non-monetary measures that he thinks we could implement, let him say so.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I am disappointed. If what has happened in the last few months, with almost the complete devastation of a large part of this industry, is the best this government can do, then I guess that that is what has to be reported to the people who are involved in the industry. It is very sad indeed.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, the people understand the problems as well as we do.

Senator Olson: Yes, and they indicated very clearly last Thursday what they think of those policies.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

PROPOSED SPLITTING OF COMMITTEE—PROGRESS OF DEBATE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Chairman of the Standing Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. On January 29, I gave notice of a motion under which I proposed that we split the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. That motion was moved on February 11 and the debate was adjourned in the name of the chairman. In view of the increasing crisis in agriculture, I wonder whether the chairman can advise me as to when he intends to speak to that matter so that we can have a vote.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Molgat for his question and I recognize the importance that he attaches to it. I discussed this matter with the Deputy Leader of the Government, Senator Doody, and he was going to consider giving me a date on which I could respond to Senator Molgat's motion. Unfortunately, the Deputy Leader is away this week. I shall speak to him as soon as he comes back, and I hope that shortly thereafter I will be able to respond.

Senator Steuart: Oh, no.

Senator Olson: Not good enough.

TRANSPORT

AIRPORT SECURITY—TESTING OF GUARDS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate give us more information about the testing of security guards at Pearson International Airport in Toronto?

Honourable senators will be aware, no doubt, that apparently there has been a high rate of failure on the written test which is now required of all security guards who work under contract for the airlines. Is the leader able to tell us more about the test that is carried out? In particular, is it the same test that is given to all security guards regardless of the contract under which they serve, and does he know whether the validity of the test has been checked? In short, does the leader have any more information about the content of the test which looks from the newspaper reports to be extremely dubious?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I cannot answer that question at the present time. It is really the sort of question which ought to be an order for return, but I shall take it as notice.

AIRPORT SECURITY—REMUNERATION OF GUARDS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could apprise us of an additional piece of information regarding this matter. It concerns the pay rates of the security guards. Would he find out for us whether the pay rates are standard under all contracts covering the various airports across the country or whether, for example, they are significantly lower at Lester B. Pearson Airport?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I shall take the question as notice.

● (1415)

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FORESTRY

PROPOSED SPLITTING OF COMMITTEE—PROGRESS OF DEBATE

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would like to address a question to the Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. It arises out of the very significant reply that he has made to Senator Molgat. I think it is most amusing and most surprising. I take it that before he makes his speech to proceed with this item he needs to obtain clearance from Senator Doody. That would suggest to me that the official position of the Conservative Party with regard to a report that was brought in from a committee of this house is that they are using Senator Marshall as a means of preventing or discouraging debate for a period of three months. I would think that that is an inappropriate use of the discipline that I am surprised they are admitting exists in the Conservative Party.

It seems to me that the way we operate in the Senate is for each senator to act on his or her responsibility, and I believe it is the responsibility of Senator Marshall to proceed with this debate, whether or not Senator Doody thinks it is appropriate to do so at one given date rather than another.

Senator Roblin: When are you going to proceed with the debate on herbicide pricing?

Senator Argue: I can do it quickly, but I am not holding it up frivolously. If someone else wants to speak on it, I will yield now.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Senator Argue mentioned the report. First of all, it is not a report; it is a motion. As the Leader of the Government has indicated, if you are talking about a time lapse, I think Senator Argue has a response to be made to the herbicide pricing report.

However, it is a matter of communication—

Senator Argue: If I make my response today, will you make yours today?

Senator Marshall: No, I will not make it today. I will make it in my own time, when I think it is appropriate, and it will be appropriate very soon. I know the importance of this situation, as I said to Senator Molgat. Senator Doody dictates the order of business and I think it is a matter of communication and a matter of courtesy, and I will make the response at the proper time.

Senator Argue: I think that is a rather revealing statement. I take personal responsibility for having stood the item on pesticides and herbicides, since I moved the motion to adjourn. However, I want to point out that it was not done on any direction or suggestion from the whip, or from any other part of the structure of the official opposition.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I would like to raise a question that I intended to raise when Order No. 16 on the order paper was called. The chairman's intention is probably to stand this motion again, but it seems appropriate now because some discussion is taking place on whether or not it should be further delayed.

I just want to say that I think it is absolutely unacceptable that the Senate should carry on without having an active committee on agriculture and on forestry. These are two of the largest sectors of our economy and the problems in those areas have been awaiting the attention of this committee for nearly three months, as Senator Argue has said.

We must bear in mind that, if all senators are agreed, our responsibility is primarily for regions, and particularly when those regions are in economic difficulty—which is certainly the case with respect to agriculture, and we have certainly had difficulty in the forest industry. Trade talks are going on now with the United States and there are now several motions before the United States Congress that will probably be passed within the next day or two, further limiting the market for Canadian softwood lumber in the United States. Surely we ought to move on this motion of Senator Molgat and set up these committees so that we can become apprised of some of the background respecting forestry.

It is also absolutely unacceptable to me that we delay any further the examination of the crisis in farm credit and in international marketing of some of the largest agricultural commodities, particularly grain. In my opinion, it is unacceptable to delay this decision until next week for the reasons that have been advanced by the chairman of that committee. I hope that he will co-operate in such a way that we can obtain some of the background material we will need to deal with these two industries that are in a near-crisis position if not a full-crisis position, instead of postponing it for what I think are very inappropriate reasons, as Senator Argue has pointed out.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, Senator Olson should recognize another fact, and that is that when the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry undertook a study on soil conservation there was a crisis in the fisheries industry. As deputy chairman of that committee I did not mention it for what I think are very inappropriate reasons, as Senator Argue has pointed out.

● (1420)

Our time slot is Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock, and I can tell my honourable friend that it is very difficult to get a quorum together at that time and on that day.

Had the honourable senator looked at the order paper before he rose, he would have seen that Order No. 16 of February 11 has not yet been responded to. I recognize that there are difficulties faced by the agriculture and forestry industries, and they will be dealt with. I will have a response as soon as possible.

Senator Olson: I agree with what Senator Marshall has said about the difficulty the fisheries industry was in. I am well aware of that and I was pleased to see that some honourable senators took on the responsibility of studying that subject. I understand that the committee is now preparing its report to the Senate on that subject.

That does not preclude or pre-empt some honourable senators taking an interest in agriculture and forestry. In my view, we would be failing in our responsibilities if we just let that languish out there without establishing a committee that would begin to gather the background information required to help the government deal with this problem.

Senator Marshall: I remind the Honourable Senator Olson, a former Leader of the Government in the Senate, that in order to discuss forestry, which is a very important subject, and in order to discuss matters of agriculture, there must be an order of reference from the Senate. That can be easily arranged, and Thursday afternoons have been set aside to consider those matters. I am prepared to call a meeting for this Thursday at 4 o'clock.

GRAIN

CONFERENCE OF MINISTERS OF EXPORTING COUNTRIES

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I should like to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to confirm that a meeting of ministers from a number of the grain exporting countries will be held in Vancouver in early June. There was what I thought to be a not completely definitive announcement regarding the date of that proposed meeting. Is that conference going to be held, and if so, will it be held on the date that has been suggested?

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): My information is that a conference is being organized for early June in Vancouver. We expect the major wheat exporting countries to be represented at that meeting.

Senator Argue: That is not an answer to my question. As I understood, when Mr. Mayer made that announcement he expected that ministers from all of the grain exporting countries would attend, as they did when Otto Lang, on an earlier occasion, arranged a similar conference. Will those in attendance be ministers, or will they be lower in authority than ministers?

Senator Roblin: I believe that invitations have been extended to ministers. We may not include all the grain exporting countries, but certainly the major ones.

Senator Argue: I do not want to misinterpret the answer, but has any country stated so far that it will not be sending a minister?

Senator Roblin: I am not aware of that.

Senator Argue: I would like to have that information. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate provide us with that information and keep us up to date on the status of those invitations and who will be attending?

Senator Roblin: Certainly.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

GARRISON DAM PROJECT—ENACTMENT OF DIVERSION UNIT LEGISLATION

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to remind him that a couple of weeks ago I asked a question pertaining to the Garrison Dam Diversion Project. The matter was being discussed in the United States Senate on the particular day that I asked my question. I wanted some information pertaining to that matter and asked that I be brought up to date.

Yesterday, May 12, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, issued a communiqué. It states, in part:

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Right Honourable Joe Clark, welcomed the signing into law today, by President Reagan, of a bill authorizing the construction of a modified Garrison Diversion Unit in North Dakota based on the December 1984 report of the Garrison Commission.

He went on to state that:

"the signing of the bill into law is welcomed by Canadians, particularly Manitobans."

● (1425)

Well, I guess that I am still behind the times. I have kept up to date with this and I would like to know the exact details of the bill that was signed—this is what I wanted in the first place—so that I can have a look at it along with other Manitobans who I know are concerned. If they had been aware of it I am sure they would have brought me up to date.

So, while this information is welcomed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, I think it would be wonderful if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could obtain copies of the bill in question within a day or two so that I could have it before going back to Manitoba. Then we can have a look at it, and if it is the case that the right honourable gentleman said that he welcomes it, possibly we will be in a position to welcome it also. But, I think that this information is very vital to our being kept up to date as to what has taken place.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, when my friend raised the point a little while ago, I made some inquiries and the preliminary information I received was that the bill in Washington respected the conditions laid down that protected the province of Manitoba and, for that reason, was acceptable to the Government of Canada.

I will try to get him a further statement with perhaps more detail that will answer some of his questions.

Senator Guay: I would ask the Leader of the Government if at the same time he would try to get a copy of the bill, whatever it pertained to, that was signed in the United States so that we can have a look at it. Possibly, it will bring us up to date on what has taken place.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to say—and to me this seems to throw a doubt on the communiqué that he has issued—on the second page of his communiqué, and I will quote it exactly the way it is:

The government will continue to monitor the implementation of the new Garrison Plan to ensure that there are no inadvertent, harmful effects to Canada from the construction and operation of the Garrison Diversion Unit.

It seems to me that after welcoming the whole thing he puts in this particular paragraph saying that there is a doubt and that we will have to be very careful and watch it very closely. So, if we could get all the papers pertaining to what has been signed in order to have a good look at it, that would possibly be helpful to Manitoba, and also might help us in putting forward suggestions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this particular regard if we are not satisfied with it.

Senator Roblin: I think my colleague wanted to make it perfectly clear that he was taking nothing for granted and, with perhaps a superabundance of caution, he was going to continue to watch this thing to ensure that unforeseen developments did not take place. I don't think it is anything more than that.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question if I may. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate, when he gets the further information, could also ensure that he has confirmation from the Manitoba government that they have been consulted and that they agree with the decision that has been made.

Senator Roblin: I will see what information is available in that respect. Intergovernmental exchanges have to be handled in a certain way.

UNITED NATIONS FOREIGN ARBITRAL AWARDS CONVENTION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-107, to implement the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards.

He said: Honourable senators, first I would like to express my thanks for being granted leave to introduce both Bill C-107 and Bill C-108 for second reading today and for your anticipated co-operation.

● (1430)

Last week, in discussing government business at the time of adjournment, I said it was anticipated that these two bills would be passed on Friday. Shortly after I made that statement, the House, in a rare moment of unanimity, passed both bills in a few moments. It was an obvious error on my part and perhaps I am compounding that error by asking for third reading later today.

Bill C-107, to implement the United Nations Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards and Bill C-108, relating to commercial arbitration, are somewhat associated so, while dealing with Bill C-107, most of my brief remarks will also apply to Bill C-108.

In June 1958, the United Nations passed a resolution on international arbitration agreements which became known as the New York Resolution. It has been endorsed by 68 of the industrialized nations of the world. Indeed Canada is, I believe, the only remaining industrialized nation which has not endorsed the resolution.

Bill C-107 will provide a means by which arbitration awards made in another country or state can be enforced in Canada. The convention will apply in commercial matters and to arbitral awards and arbitration agreements concluded before or after the coming into force of the Foreign Arbitral Awards Convention Act. Presently, enforcing an arbitral award in Canada is an involved and time-consuming process and is often very expensive. This bill will simplify the procedure by the simple expedient of providing for the filing of the awards in courts. The courts, in turn, may refuse the award under certain circumstances such as the legal incapacity of one of the parties or where the awards made under the agreement would be against the public policy of Canada.

Honourable senators, in order to have full implementation of the convention and to ensure that Canada can meet its international obligations, it is necessary for the provinces and the territories to enact similar legislation with respect to property and other rights falling within provincial jurisdiction. You will be interested to know that all the provinces have agreed to pass the legislation required. It is my understanding that British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia have already passed the required legislation. The other provinces and the territories anticipate the legislation will be passed by the end of June this year.

Honourable senators, in giving leave, Senator Frith indicated that I would give reasons for asking for the passage of this legislation. One reason is that it is an advantage to Canadian firms or individuals doing business in foreign states. The contract can include an agreement outlining a number of arbiters, the subjects to be arbitrated in case of dispute and, what is most important, the location of the site of arbitration.

[Senator Phillips]

This should speed up the settlement of any dispute and becomes very important if construction is involved.

Another reason I would urge passage of this bill is because Canadian firms or individuals should in the future be able to compete on an equal basis with other nations who have signed the New York Resolution.

Recently Canadians have become extremely interested in British Columbia's Expo '86. The Province and the City of Vancouver hope that the publicity surrounding Expo will allow that city to become a site for international arbitration. This will provide certain opportunities for employment and a certain financial prestige from which we would all like to see that city benefit.

Indeed, this week, honourable senators, meetings are taking place in Vancouver in an effort to assist that city in becoming a site for international arbitration. It would benefit those who are participating in that meeting if they were able to say that, finally, Canada has its own house in order.

I urge honourable senators to support the legislation for those reasons plus the fact that since 1958 a succession of Canadian governments have been negotiating with the provinces to pass similar legislation. They have now agreed to pass that legislation and Canada can participate fully in this international convention.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think no one would argue with the proposition that we should not, in the Senate, give prompt, short or time-abridged approval to legislation simply because the House of Commons has done so; but I do not think anyone would argue either that we should be so pigheaded about it as to refuse to do so even when there is a good reason for it.

For that reason, honourable senators, we support this legislation. We think there is good reason for the rapid consideration it was given in the House of Commons and that there is good reason for us to give it the same prompt attention.

As Senator Phillips has demonstrated, this legislation, I suppose, could be described, to use the somewhat hackneyed phrase, as long overdue.

As he has pointed out, in Canada, unlike the other nations which have subscribed to this highly desirable scheme, if you want to enforce one of the international awards, you really have to start afresh with a court case and bring an action as you would in any other set of circumstances such as alleging the facts of an automobile accident and go through the whole procedure. Your cause of action is simply the fact that you have this award, but you have to take it through the court to enforce it. Many honourable senators, both lawyers and businessmen, will recognize that there are occasions when it is most appropriate to have disputes, especially disputes arising out of contracts, settled by arbitration or by a system of arbitration rather than taking them through the regular court proceedings under the Judicature Act and the rules of practice.

That is what happens at the present time and the recommendation and the principles of this legislation are to enable those arbitral agreements that are made internationally to be enforced in Canada without having to go through the much longer procedure of bringing an action through the regular courts.

That is the background. I believe honourable senators who have been associated with recent governments will realize that the previous government similarly wanted to adopt this legislation and supported it strongly. It was unable to get the necessary agreement from the provinces, necessary, as honourable senators will realize, because there is a split in jurisdiction here, the federal government being responsible for international affairs, which is one aspect of this legislation and the other aspect of the legislation is the provincial jurisdiction where enforcement awards fall under subsection 92(13) of the Constitution Act, 1982 where the provinces have jurisdiction over property and civil rights. It meant that it was the type of legislation that had both provincial and federal jurisdictional elements and that it could not work without co-operation between the two levels of government.

● (1440)

As Senator Phillips has pointed out, all provinces have finally agreed to pass the necessary legislation so that it can work on a pan-Canada basis. Indeed, three provinces have already passed the legislation. I understand that British Columbia, as part of its Expo celebrations, had set aside May 12 as the day on which it would establish an international arbitration centre. Honourable senators, they cannot really proceed officially until the legislation has passed this house and received Royal Assent. It does mean that if we give this bill second reading today, as I believe we should, and if we do not refer it to committee but give it third reading either today or tomorrow, depending on the wish of the Senate, then we would not make our usual close and detailed scrutiny of the legislation, nor would we take the opportunity to improve it as no doubt it could be improved with enough attention, but we will be bringing into effect what has been a long overdue procedure in Canadian law. Perhaps, after some experience with its provisions, if we find that there is need for improvement, other legislation will be presented to us to effect that improvement.

For those reasons I recommend that honourable senators give this bill second reading and that they do not refer it to committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, would the sponsor of the bill agree to move that it be read the third time later this day so that I can have an opportunity to discuss it with him in the meantime?

Senator Phillips: I am perfectly agreeable to that, honourable senators.

Accordingly, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL ARBITRATION BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-108, relating to commercial arbitration.

He said: Honourable senators, I indicated when speaking on Bill C-107 that most of my remarks on that bill would also apply to Bill C-108. There are two additional points that I could mention. Bill C-108 authorizes a government agency or department such as Supply and Services to insert an arbitration clause in its contracts if both parties so agree. It also allows companies, such as a construction company building an apartment building for a financial group, to have a similar agreement placed in their contracts. This should speed up the settlement of disputes that arise during a contract of any type. I am sure that in the future this bill will also be beneficial in terms of settling disputes that can end up with one party's bankruptcy occurring in the process of the dispute. I am sure that all parties concerned will benefit from the proposed legislation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, as Senator Phillips has pointed out, these two bills are interlocked. Bill C-107 is less effective without Bill C-108, and Bill C-108 is impossible without Bill C-107. The reasons for which I recommended the adoption at second reading of Bill C-107 apply with equal force to Bill C-108.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading later this day.

SMOKING PROHIBITION BILL

MOTION FOR SECOND READING—MOTION IN AMENDMENT—POINT OF ORDER—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Haidasz, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Bosa, for the second reading of the Bill S-8, intituled: "An Act to prohibit smoking in certain work areas and on board certain modes of transport",

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Godfrey, seconded by the Honourable Senator Steuart (Prince Albert-Duck Lake), that the Bill be not now read the second time, but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs for consideration and report.—(Speaker's Ruling).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, the decision of the Chair on this matter will be given next week.

Order stands.

RULES OF THE SENATE

RULE 77(7) AMENDED TO PROHIBIT SMOKING AT SITTINGS OF THE SENATE AND MEETINGS OF ITS COMMITTEES

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.”

And on the motion in amendment thereto of the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C., that the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended to read as follows:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at meetings of the Senate and of its committees.”—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this motion has been before us since January. It has received considerable debate in the house and has now been amended by a motion of Senator Flynn. That motion clarifies that the intent of the rule is to prohibit smoking in committees and that, by doing so, it does not mean to suggest that it is therefore permissible to smoke in the Senate chamber. I think that is a very sensible amendment. Although I certainly want to give honourable senators the opportunity to continue to speak to this matter if they so wish, I respectfully suggest that it has quite a history in the chamber and that it might be time to put the question and dispose of it.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Côtteau:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at all meetings of Senate committees.”

In amendment, it is moved by the Senator Flynn, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Walker, P.C.:

That the motion be not now adopted but that it be amended to read as follows:

That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding, immediately after Rule 77(7), the following:

“(8) Smoking is prohibited at meetings of the Senate and of its committees.”

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion in amendment?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Paul Lucier: On division.

Motion in amendment agreed to, on division.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion, as amended?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Some Hon. Senators: On division.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, on division.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

CONSIDERATION OF REPORT OF SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE ON FILM ENTITLED: “THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS”—MOTION TO REFER REPORT BACK TO COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Eighth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production “The Kid Who Couldn't Miss”, tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Molson).

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, after all of the excellent speeches on the report of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, which considered the film entitled “The Kid Who Couldn't Miss”, I find myself faced with the task of summing up and presenting my suggestions for the solution to the national embarrassment that is this film.

First, let me say that I think that the subcommittee's hearings were thorough and fair. I believe that the summary of its report, with one exception, was well done, although I disagree with the recommendation. I do not think that the addition of printed words in the film will do anything to clear the name of Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, V.C.

The exception that I have to the summary is that since the study began, I have come to doubt more and more that Mr. Cowan's motives in producing the film were honourable. I believe that if the producer acted with his best personal and professional integrity, the film reflects the fact that those qualities are inconsistent with the standard of the National Film Board.

● (1450)

I am convinced that Mr. Cowan was not honest with the history of World War I, nor was he honest with the recorded facts of the life and times of Billy Bishop, Canada's most decorated serviceman.

The report observes that the film was not supported by historians. It mentions evidence given by Dr. Wise, Mr. Taylor, Professor Kear and Colonel Bauer in support of Bishop. The committee's report points out that the original objective, for which Mr. Cowan received a budget of $400,000, was never followed and that when he decided to change the direction of the film, the whole matter should have been thoroughly re-examined. The National Film Board was responsible to see that at least a balanced approach to historical facts was observed. That was not done.

The most objectionable feature—and this is brought out strongly in the report—is the use of rumours and statements purported to have been made to unofficial historian D.W. Warne. Putting those ideas into the mouth of the actor playing Walter Bourne is fabricating evidence. Bourne was a devoted mechanic, very close to Bishop. He made Bishop's Nieuport serviceable for every one of the scores of flights the pilot made. Bishop's life depended on him. It is utterly dishonest to have this airman appear to say things which he certainly never said.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

Senator Molson: It just won't fly. In the film Bourne is made to express doubt about Bishop's ability to remove the Lewis gun from the airplane. I have personally spoken to an experienced mechanic at the Canadian War Museum who works on those vintage aircraft. He told me that he could take off the Lewis gun with the greatest of ease. Why did not Mr. Cowan speak to him? I might add, for the information of honourable senators, that there is a replica of the Nieuport 17 in the National Aviation Museum at Rockcliffe, and, for those who have never seen one, they might find it interesting to look at. It is so unbelievably small, compared with what we think of today as being aircraft, that it is hard to believe that a man could go up in the air for approximately 200 sorties and engage in all of the battles in which he engaged. That Nieuport weighs only 825 pounds empty. The Hurricane-type fighter that I flew weighed 7,900 pounds, nearly 8,000—practically 10 times as much—and the F-18, about which we all know a great deal, weighs about 50,000 pounds fully loaded. So honourable senators can see that it is a far cry from the 1917 vintage aircraft that Billy Bishop flew.

I quote from the report as follows:

Throughout the film, the chronology of events is hopelessly scrambled. In general, this may be due to dramatic licence, to the effort to give the film greater audience appeal. In one particular instance, however, the film uses a chronological shift to give Bishop a powerful motive for faking the attack on a German airfield.

This, of course, is where the Victoria Cross raid is shifted from 1917, at the middle of Bishop's time with 60 Squadron, to become the climax of his World War I career. That is misleading and dishonest. It ignores the fact that Bishop returned to action in 1918 with a different squadron, No. 85, and added 25 more victories to his score nine months after he had received the V.C.

The report draws attention to the fictitious suggestion that a lot of brass hats were waiting for the return of Bishop from his early morning raid. This is completely untrue. The film even shows a picture of King George V at this stage, suggesting that perhaps the king was waiting for him. All this is simply imaginary evidence. It is phony. It is deliberately placed to convey a false impression, to cause the viewer to draw an untrue conclusion.

We do not know who speaks for the National Film Board. In recent weeks we have had articles or interviews with three different people, each of whom has expressed his opinion about the film or about the Senate committee. For example, an article on April 17 by the Canadian Press says that Mr. Cowan has already rejected the recommendation from the Senate subcommittee that his film should include a disclaimer labelling the film partly as fiction.

The executive producer, Adam Symansky, is quoted by the Canadian Press as saying that he would not approve the wording of any disclaimer which labels the film or any of its parts as fiction.

Well, according to the National Film Board Annual Report for 1984-85, the film was entered in a festival in Switzerland in the category of "Full Length or Short Fiction Film". Both Mr. Symansky and Mr. Cowan repeat that their docu-drama is truth, but they present it internationally as both documentary and fiction, but not as docu-drama.

The Commissioner, speaking for the Film Board, is quoted as saying that he was pleased that the Senate had agreed with his decision to re-label the film a "docu-drama". What nerve! It took him two years and a Senate hearing to make his decision. He said, on November 28 last, that re-labelling would take effect "from today", and would be applied to all copies of the film. But has the National Film Board lived up to its promise?

I have a letter saying that on March 17 of this year the film was shown and that it had no such disclaimer. On April 23 the film was shown again in Ottawa and it had no disclaimer, although a statement from the National Film Board was read to the audience before the screening. Once again one has to ask: Where is the Film Board's integrity?

Mr. Symansky is quoted in the press as criticizing senators for refusing to hear witnesses from the NFB sources, including Bishop's World War I associate, Willy Fry. I quote his words:

Willy Fry, the only living pilot who flew with Bishop.

That is an absolute falsehood. Willy Fry is not the only living pilot who flew with Bishop. There are several others, whom I will mention shortly, who escaped Cowan's research or who did not fit his desired category of witness. This selectivity is plainly dishonest. And what of the charge that the committee refused to call witnesses desired by the National Film Board? Also false, according to Senator Marshall, the chairman of the committee.

Incidentally, Mr. Cowan did not think very highly of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs. He made a statement to the Toronto Star on April 17, and I quote:

Consider the nature of the subcommittee, a group of war veterans with a large and powerful constituency of other war veterans. Was this committee going to be impartial in judging a film that criticized the making of a war legend?

He was certainly not making any legend. He was destroying one.

The facts are that the senators who served on the committee are nine in number. Of these nine senators only one was a war veteran of the Canadian Forces and one a veteran of the Royal Navy. So much for Mr. Cowan's outburst. And something else, what is wrong with having a million Canadian veterans and their families at Billy Bishop's side? They are the ones who are most offended by Cowan's denigration of Bishop's memory. We, honourable senators, must come to their support.

• (1500)

Unfortunately for this film, Paul Cowan's research was totally superficial and very lacking in depth. Colonel Bauer's research here, in England, in France and in Germany emphasizes that lack of depth. The evidence of Stewart Taylor, the official historian of the World War I flyers, also strongly supports the honesty of Bishop as against the innuendoes in the film and supports the fact that none of Bishop's wartime comrades had any doubt about his honesty in 1917. In the evidence given to the committee one will see that a letter was filed from Air Vice-Marshal Stevenson in Vancouver. He stated that he had talked with Don MacLaren, Nick Carter and George Howsam, World War I fighter pilots in France and highly decorated for their achievements. He said, "They are amazed that a campaign to discredit Bishop should arise, let alone receive support from a government agency."

Honourable senators will also see a letter sent by Sir William Stephenson, the man called "Intrepid", who states forcefully that he as an aviator knew Bishop, served at the front with him and that he is incensed that such charges should be made in this film sponsored by the Canadian Government. All these people who knew Bishop at the time contradict completely the statements produced by the National Film Board. But were they contacted by Paul Cowan when he researched his film? Of course not. I said earlier that there were other pilots still alive who flew with Bishop. J.B. Crompton, living in Toronto, was in Bishop's flight in 60 Squadron. He was not consulted by the National Film Board nor was he offered as a witness. He has made a statement that he was in the mess of 60 Squadron the night Bishop's Victoria Cross was announced and that they had quite a celebration. Mr. Crompton states categorically that there was no feeling held by the personnel of 60 Squadron that Bishop was in any way fraudulent or dishonest.

Another 60 Squadron member in 1917 is Tim Hervey in Leighton Buzzard, England. He received his pilot wings with Billy Bishop in 1917 and both went to 60 Squadron and flew Nieuports in the same flight. Tim Hervey voiced no doubt whatsoever about Billy Bishop's honesty when Colonel Bauer spoke with him earlier this year. This is in direct contradiction to the evidence used by the Film Board from the tape of Archibald James. He stated that Bishop was known to be a fraud. This statement is a lie. Such a thing was not generally known. In fact, there is no evidence that there was even a suggestion during World War I that Bishop was fraudulent and that he was cheating. I must also tell you that in January of this year, Peter Simkins, Chief Historian of the Imperial War Museum, when interviewed on a BBC news program implied that James was not a reliable witness. But the National Film Board does not want to hear that! No! If James' outrageous statement can be used to help condemn Billy Bishop, it will be used.

The producer plunged straight ahead, using only the words of those who supported his personal convictions and disregarding all the evidence showing probability that Bishop's claims were valid. And note that the one British historian who appears in the film, Alex McKee, is pointedly not asked about Billy Bishop. We must ask why not.

No one has denied that there can be those who doubt that Bishop did all that he said. Anybody is allowed to doubt any record. But to rewrite history, there must be a convincing weight of supporting evidence. There must be actual historians making statements, and citing actual records, not nameless and faceless individuals who deny existing and accepted history. How elusive is the quality of integrity in this work! None of us wants to dampen creative and artistic effort in this country. But those qualities have to be used responsibly and objectively in historical work. In this film creative and artistic effort were used to advance a personal theme at the expense of truth.

It has already been acknowledged that the Film Board has done excellent work in the past. However, that does not mean that it cannot make a mistake. Even the Government Film Commissioner acknowledged in his testimony that a mistake has been made. They are not infallible. But the producer and the executive producer have been issuing strident claims that they are telling the truth and that they will not accept the concept of correction of the film. Moreover, they say the Senate did not give them a fair hearing, that it is all very unfair to them when all they wanted to do was to show how horrible war is. We know that wars are horrible. We do not question the right of a film producer to remind us, but we do question very seriously the use of public funds, and a large amount—remember, $400,000—and, particularly, use of the prestigious label of the National Film Board of Canada to destroy the reputation of a hero, whether Bishop or any other or, in fact, the reputation of any individual without proof. This is our main objection to the film. It is made to appear as presenting the truth, and it is a lie. We in Parliament cannot condone the dishonesty of any government agency. In this case the known history of Billy Bishop has been distorted and he has been shown falsely as a fraud and a cheat.

The film is simply and totally a mistake. We in Parliament have not only the right to criticize the false effort of a government agency, but the responsibility to do so. It is our duty to attack what is not in the public interest. It is our duty to defend the reputation and the heritage of our country. In the matter of an individual who has been attacked irresponsibly, it is our duty to come to his defence. The right to one's reputation is one of the freedoms for which we fought and which, without question, we should defend.

I should point out that there has been an enormous amount of support in the form of letters from the general public regarding our investigation of the film. The national press and media have been objective and fair-minded in discussing the matter and the Senate's handling of it.

Honourable senators, before I finish I want to make some brief observations on my perception of the general image of our chamber. In the many years that I have been in the Senate, I have with great regret seen that the high public regard for our institution, noticeable when I first came here, has been decreasing year by year and particularly so in recent times. Today we hear or read all the time things like: How unnecessary, how useless, how ineffective and moribund is the Senate. Some people want to abolish it. Others want to reform it and others want to elect the members. There is not much respect apparent. Perhaps part of the cause is that the Senate never seems to have the courage of its convictions. Perhaps part of the cause is the highly visible partisanship that has developed in the house. Perhaps our objective and traditionally rather more independent view has been eroded. Whatever the cause or causes, the reputation of the Senate is dramatically lower than it was when I was introduced.

In this case, however, it is obvious to all of us in the chamber that there is no element of partisanship. During the existence of this film there has been a minister responsible from both the Liberal and Conservative governments. There have been letters of encouragement to us as supporters of truth in history from top leaders of these parties. In the Senate, I have been assured by the Leader of the Government and the Deputy Leader of the Opposition that no instruction for support or otherwise has been or will be issued in either caucus. I trust that the Leader of the Opposition will not consider this a discourtesy that in his absence I got this statement from his deputy.

• (1510)

The report of the Senate committee clearly indicates that damage has been done by the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." Damage has been done to our national image, to our pride, to all those who served to protect our liberty and our way of life, to the families of those who gave their lives and, last but not least, to the members of Billy Bishop's family. Perhaps I should add that damage has been done to the National Film Board itself. There are undoubtedly millions of Canadians who look to us to have the courage and clarity of vision to correct the unjust and unjustified attack on this country's leading hero of World War I. We must get up off our knees and accept our responsibility.

In view of all that has been said in the excellent speeches by other senators, my own clear convictions persuade me that the Senate has no choice but to act positively and firmly in this matter.

I therefore move:

That the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986, be referred back to the Committee with instructions to consider and report upon the following:

Strike out page 20 and substitute

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added: "This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne."

2. That the National Film Board be requested to take action to eliminate from the film the unproven allegations, charges and innuendoes against the integrity of Billy Bishop.

3. That a copy of this Report as it stands or as it may be amended, be formally submitted to the Honourable Minister of Communications, with the request that it be transmitted to the National Film Board along with the Minister's specific instruction of action required of the Board to correct the wrong that has been done to the factual record of the late Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, Victoria Cross.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): If no one wishes to speak to it, I move the adjournment of the debate. If Senator Thériault wishes to speak to it now, I will speak to it afterwards.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I merely want to say that I was not prepared to vote on the motion until I had read it. However, if Senator Frith is moving the adjournment of the debate, that is fine with me.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

TENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Tenth Report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders (Register of Senators' Interests), presented in the Senate on 7th May, 1986.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat moved that the report be adopted.

He said: Honourable senators, perhaps I may make some brief comments, although I think the report is self-explanatory. The committee studied this question, which is very much before Parliament these days. We had a statement here today on the matter and we have observed what has happened in the other place over the past two weeks. The committee recognizes the importance of this matter to parliamentarians and the need to clarify the situation.

However, in its study the committee found that there is a great conflict at the moment in the existing law which is contained in both the Criminal Code and in the Senate and House of Commons Act. It was the view of the members of the committee that it would not be sensible, at this point, for the committee to propose a new set of rules until such time as there is a clarification of the situation with respect to the existing law in those other two statutes.

In recent years, the courts have interpreted the law in different ways. Originally, it is my understanding that the particular section of the Criminal Code under consideration was not meant to apply specifically to parliamentarians, but basically to public servants. However, the interpretation has now been broadened to include parliamentarians and it is our recommendation, therefore, that we should ask the government to instruct its law officers, in consultation with legal counsel from this house and the other place, to have a look at the existing law and on that basis to prepare a number of recommendations. When that has been done, then we would recommend that these recommendations be referred back to the committees of both houses for further study and report at that time.

In our view, we would not be serving the case by proposing now a set of new rules until such time as the existing statutes are clarified.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

CONSIDERATION OF TWENTY-EIGHTH AND TWENTY-NINTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE—ORDERS STAND

On the Orders:

Consideration of the Twenty-eighth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Banking, Trade and Commerce), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Consideration of the Twenty-ninth Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration (Supplementary Budget of Energy and Natural Resources), presented in the Senate on 29th April, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Order Nos. 10 and 11 will have to stand again for another day or so.

Orders stand.

REGULATIONS AND OTHER STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

FIFTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

[Senator Molgat]

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Murray, for the adoption of the Fifth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments (Statutory Instruments No. 32), presented in the Senate on 20th March, 1986.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that this order must also stand, for the same reason as was previously given.

Order stands.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

● (1520)

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Third Report of the Special Senate Committee on National Defence entitled: "Military Air Transport", tabled on Thursday, February 20, 1986.

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, I apologize for the long delay in pursuing this item, which has now been on the Orders of the Day for several weeks. My persistent optimism led me to believe that a firm statement would be forthcoming on the where, when, what and how of a white paper on Canada's Defence Policy, which your committee has been requesting for years. At this point, it appears that the possibility of such a statement is rapidly diffusing into the drizzle and fog of double talk.

Throughout the last general election campaign, Canadians were lured by the promise of an early review and statement of defence policy. The Prime Minister, and successive Ministers of Defence, reiterated that commitment in many instances after reaching office, putting back the deadline each time. As recently as October 24, 1985, the Associate Minister of National Defence stated before our committee, and I quote:

The white paper has been a long time coming. It is very high on the priority list. There is a lot of work going on. The target is to have it by year end.

On March 20, I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a straightforward, simple question as to the status of the white paper. I have received no reply.

On April 29, Senator Molgat asked a question along the same lines, which the Leader of the Government in the Senate answered off the cuff in his best evasive manner.

On April 30, the Prime Minister made a hit-and-run statement at a pre-departure press conference which the Ottawa Citizen headed: "Brutal Economic Realities Have Shrunk Policy Options on Defence."

Answers to questions on the same subject in the other place by the Associate Minister on May 1, by the Minister and Deputy Prime Minister on May 2, have further obfuscated the issue, and effectively relegated the questions of security, territorial sovereignty and defence to the marsh, three miles in the bush, behind the backlot of Canadian self-esteem.

Honourable senators, I shall return to the absenteeism of defence policy later in my remarks.

May I at this point call attention to the fact that the other place, after at least two generations of parliamentarians, has reinstituted a committee dedicated exclusively to matters of national defence.

May I also note, for the record, the announced retirement, on July 11 next, of General G.C.E. Thériault as Chief of Defence Staff. General Thériault was one of the first senior defence staff officers to appear before your committee in 1981 and since then has been extremely open and co-operative in providing the committee with the information and assistance it needed.

He is to be succeeded by General Paul D. Manson who, as Co-ordinator of Air-Sea Rescue when we were inquiring into Maritime Command, and as Chief of Air Command during our inquiries into Canada's Territorial Air Defence and into Military Air Transport, was equally forthcoming with information, assistance and guidance.

Both of these gentlemen are the personification of the high competence and efficiency of the senior officers of the Canadian Armed Forces, many of whom members of our committee have come to know. Now retired or coming through the ranks, they are as essential an element of the Canadian fabric as may be our entrepreneurs, our prime producers, our artists, our teachers or our labourers. Pity that so few of our military on retirement enter politics. Their discipline might teach us and others many valuable things.

Now to the Senate Special Committee on National Defence's latest report.

Your committee over the last five years has envisaged its task as carrying out an audit of our requirements, in manpower and equipment, vis-à-vis our territorial defence needs, our stance on sovereign integrity, our commitments to our allies and our peacekeeping undertakings.

We have dealt in turn with manpower, Maritime Command, territorial air defence and now military air transport. We have pointed out the deficiencies; showed up the procrastination at remedying them; have been conscious of the costs involved and posted them up; and have concluded that we can afford them over phased periods, which we have very carefully outlined.

We have attempted to encourage the political will to give national defence the attention and resources it demands and have succeeded, in my estimation, to a considerable extent with Canadians, with the media, but apparently have not permeated Canadian governments.

In our fourth report, on military air transport, we have established that both our equipment and our manpower are sadly inadequate.

Many of our transport aircraft are too old and on the verge of retirement. Attrition is not being compensated for. Two Hercules lost in an accident a year ago have not yet been replaced. We are told this replacement has a high priority but no move has yet been made. Our fleet of Hercules, reduced to 26 aircraft, aged from 2 to 21 years, would be due for retirement in 1995 unless some action is taken.

Because of the lack of numbers our aircraft are overflown and their crews are overstressed in meeting our normal peacetime requirements. Of course there are some planned replacements in the normal course of things, but there is no assurance they will be proceeded with. They should be overreached without delay.

There are many technical and other details of the unacceptable state of Air Transport Group given in our report. I urge senators to take note of them. Our Air Transport Group faces bloc obsolescence of its equipment in the early 1990s, yet no concrete move appears in the offing. In only a few years we will be faced with the inability to meet our own territorial peacetime requirements. There will go our reliability in the eyes of our allies, and God help us should disaster strike. Yet we readily invest DND funds in Challenger jets for "administrative flights" for non-military VIPs.

The 10 Tactical Air Group is in a similar situation—short of personnel and equipment, obsolescent equipment, aircraft and crews committed simultaneously both at home and in Europe. Yet we volunteer a commitment of nine CH-135 Twin Huey helicopters to serve in Sinai as of this April.

This deplorable state of affairs can be remedied, as our report demonstrates, at a moderate increase of $255 million annually over the next 15 years; that is, roughly 0.05 per cent of GNP, surely a modest and affordable cost. If only the political will were there.

Our report demonstrates as well that the cumulative cost of all recommendations in our four reports requires increased expenditures on defence of about $1.2 billion annually over the next 15 years, an increase of 0.27 per cent to 2.33 per cent of our GNP in defence costs. Surely, here again a modest and affordable amount to assure the credibility and the efficiency of our defence establishment.

● (1530)

One important aspect of military air transport which the committee spent some time on is the availability of civilian resources in this field, both equipment and personnel.

It is obvious when one takes up the subject of military air transport that no country should, and few countries could, maintain a fleet sufficient to answer all needs in times of crisis or hostilities.

In most other countries this can be achieved without major disturbances because there are in place other modes of transport. Canada, however, because of its vast distances and its geography, would have to maintain the operation of a large nonmilitary air transport capacity to avoid complete paralysis.

We therefore must have in place plans based on an up-to-date inventory of civilian capacity, establishing the numbers that can be diverted and mechanisms and legal means through which such requisitioning of equipment and personnel as is available and as is needed can be achieved.

Your committee submits therefore the following recommendations:

Prompt action should be initiated to permit the requisitioning of civil aircraft in times of emergency and to encourage the participation of civilian air and ground crews in the common defence effort. New emergency legislation is urgently required, government management systems should be strengthened, and government-industry co-operation enhanced.

Noting the very limited number of large cargo aircraft available in Canada in the civilian sector, the Committee urges the government to encourage the development of such capability where it seems practical and cost-effective.

The government should pursue the current negotiations on Integrated Lines of Communications (ILOC) and Safe Haven arrangements with the aim of establishing effective bilateral or other agreements as soon as possible.

These do not involve extraordinary expenditures and surely could be proceeded with without delay.

If I may return now to the hide-and-seek white paper on National Defence.

On April 15, the Honourable Allan McKinnon, an ex-Minister of National Defence, stated:

I think we should get a little more definite about it. We are either going to have one or we are not.

And later he said:

—the period of time this thing has been in gestation is for longer than would be necessary to write a white paper, if the aim of the white paper is to clarify the goals you hope to attain and leave it at that, rather than to hope it will fit an upsurge in the economy.

On the same occasion, the Assistant Deputy Minister of Defence, Policy, Mr. John F. Anderson stated:

This is a good time to be producing a white paper that would try to look well ahead as to where we should be going.

Mr. Anderson appears to be the designated official to manage the production of a white paper on defence. I surmise that he has already done so. In fact the press has reported many times over the last eight to twelve months that this white paper was before cabinet.

I suspect the irresolute and "fraidy" influences of the ministers and Departments of External Affairs, Finance and Treasury Board prevailed in an irresolute and "fraidy" government and they sent the proposals back to DND.

The quotations from Mr. McKinnon I gave earlier defined one of the aims of a white paper as "clarifying the goals you hope to attain." What is so difficult about that if you address the problem with determination?

So we cannot afford to achieve those aims at the present time! What is shameful or demeaning about saying so? As we go along and can afford more, these are the guidelines we intend to follow. This should be stated.

[Senator Lafond.]

Your committee has proposed a series of programs phased over 15 years or so. Let the government in office adopt them, modify, prolong or shorten them, but let that government tell us where it wants to lead us in terms of defence, then we shall judge. Prolonged stagnation was unacceptable under the previous government; it is no more acceptable under the present one.

An editorial in the Winnipeg Free Press of April 21 noted:

The last thing the government should do is to shelve its plans to produce a white paper on defence policy. Fifteen years have gone by since the last white paper on defence was produced. More important than the elapsed time is the need within Canada for a clear statement, like that heard on the election stump, of the government's priorities in defence matters. The members of Canada's armed forces need to know where they are heading, and the taxpayers of the country need to know the costs involved.

I continue that quotation:

Fiscal restraint should not prevent the government from announcing its long term goals in defence, even if these goals amount to little more than a wish list.

Of late the Prime Minister and the Ministers of National Defence have been leaning on the inadequacies of the previous government to justify their own. What utter nonsense! Your committee in its reports has highlighted the failures and neglect of defence by the last Liberal government in more forceful terms than has any other source. But that government made no commitments. The present one has.

Let me quote Jeffrey Simpson in the Globe and Mail of April 22:

The federal government has backed away from a sorely needed national debate on defence, leaving our defence priorities as poorly considered as ever.

The Speech from the Throne of November 1984, promised a national debate. "My government is convinced that Canada's defence forces urgently require a new definition of their role." The Speech declared. "The strategic context in which we defend our own territory and that of our allies has changed considerably since the early 1970s... My ministers are undertaking a comprehensive examination of these matters."

And Mr. Simpson concluded:

In the Tories' marshmallow election campaign, the need for a debate was brushed aside in the airy promises to boost real spending on defence by 6 per cent per year.

That promise has gone the way of many good intentions. The country would be well served if we got those issues back on the table and thrashed them out.

Honourable senators, a white paper on national defence must be produced now and the pattern must be set for the tabling of such a document annually as do most of our allies. Nothing more should need to be said on this chapter.

● (1540)

We have made some progress. In terms of personnel, we are increasing at the set snail's pace of about 400 additional persons per year. The promised increase of 1,200 in the Central Europe establishment has not materialized. Lip-service is still being paid to the reserves with no improvement in their numbers or in their lot.

We have acquired some tanks and some land vehicles. We are refurbishing our small arms arsenal. We have acquired half as many Aurora aircraft as we need. Deliveries of CF-18 aircraft are on schedule.

Phase I of the frigate program is proceeding not painlessly. Phase II, for an additional six units, which should be contracted for no later than next year, is persistently set aside. There have been no moves on conventional submarines or mine-sweepers.

We have recently had blatant announcements of the selection of contractors—Oerlikon-Buhrle for low-level air defence systems and Litton systems for updating four Tribal class destroyers. Two billion dollars has been spent and there has been much gloating about the number of jobs involved. As of a week ago, in the Litton contract, there was no discussion of cost, of times of delivery or of any final matters. This, apparently, was announced last Friday. The Oerlikon-Buhrle contract is up in the air. Many of these initiatives remain wrapped in the envelope of bombast and, not to say, blarney.

NATO documents reveal that in 1985 we remained 13th out of 14, only ahead of Luxembourg in percentage of the gross domestic product devoted to defence expenditures. We stand sixth in terms of defence equipment expenditures, having obviously so much catching up to do. We stand second last, again just ahead of Luxembourg, in terms of our total armed forces as a percentage of our total labour force.

Spain joined NATO too late to be included in these tables, but the annual report entitled "The Military Balance 1985-86," compiled by the London Institute for Military Studies places it ahead of Canada in this equation.

Senators may be interested to learn that this same report reveals that the most neutral of nations, Switzerland—small, compact, with natural geographical defences, a population of 6.5 million—devoted 2.16 per cent of its GDP in 1984 to defence expenditures as compared to Canada's 2.2 per cent. Regular Swiss armed forces amounted to 1,500 plus 18,500 recruits who are taken in twice a year for 20 weeks of service and reserves of 625,000 of which 400,000 undergo refresher training annually. Canada has 83,000 regular and 24,700 reserves.

Canada may be far removed from the historical areas of conflict, but Canada has more land and more coastline to stand on guard for than any other country. We are not doing it nor are we putting ourselves in a posture to honour all of our commitments. I do not like it and the population of Canada does not like it, particularly in view of the rescue of corporate clients of mismanaged banks, of the tax relief accorded mismanaged petroleum consortia or Olympia and York, at a billion dollars a shot, all in the space of one year or less, and then pleading poverty when it comes to defence.

Canada and its governments must soon rediscover the political will and the determination to assure its security, its sovereignty and to carry its weight honourably among its allies.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear.

On motion of Senator Marshall, debate adjourned.

RULES OF THE SENATE

MOTION TO AMEND RULE 67(1)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Molgat, seconded by the Honourable Senator Barrow:

That Rule 67(1) of the Rules of the Senate be amended by striking out paragraph (n) and substituting the following:

"(n) The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to agriculture and forestry generally, and the Canadian Wheat Board."; and

That the following new paragraph be added immediately after paragraph (n):

"(n.1) The Senate Committee on Fisheries, composed of twelve members, four of whom shall constitute a quorum, to which shall be referred, on order of the Senate, bills, messages, petitions, inquiries, papers and other matters relating to fisheries generally."—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Stand.

Hon. D. G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I believe Senator Molgat pointed out in Question Period that we, on this side, would like to see this order proceeded with. I should like to notify Senator Marshall that we would like to proceed with it tomorrow because we think this subject is of the utmost importance to the agricultural community. I hope he will be prepared to deal with it tomorrow notwithstanding his comments regarding the return of the deputy leader. Some of us on this side feel that we do not want to wait but that the debate should proceed although the matter may not be finalized until the deputy leader returns.

Senator Marshall: I will discuss this with the powers that be. I will be ready to proceed in a very short time.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Marshall may consider yielding to someone else who wishes to participate in this debate. We are not being asked to vote on this matter but Senator Marshall may consider yielding to someone else.

Senator Marshall: I agree that could be done. If anyone wants to speak before I do, they are welcome to do so.

Hon. H. A. Olson: Honourable senators, I do not want to repeat the arguments I made earlier today in Question Period, but I would like Senator Marshall to understand that I support what Senator Steuart has just said. Whether the decision is Senator Marshall's or that of the, as he said, "powers that be"—and I think he is sitting right here in the chamber, that is, the Leader of the Government—we want to get on with this matter. Perhaps we should debate the matter tomorrow but at least later this week or early next week, we hope to be in a position to vote on it so that the matter is completed.

As has been pointed out or ought to be pointed out, this motion is based on a committee report and we are ready to deal with it. Any further delay is unacceptable.

Hon. Duff Roblin (Leader of the Government): I think we should make it clear that if any senator wishes to speak in this debate now, we are quite willing to stand down and let him do so.

Senator Steuart: Honourable senators, I will take advantage of that.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Steuart: It is not my intention to speak at length but I would point out that for many years we have had an active Agriculture Committee. Some time ago it was melded with the committee which dealt with forestry and fisheries, a decision, which, at that time, was agreeable to everyone.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry is now dealing with a question of the utmost importance, namely fisheries. In due course it will, no doubt, produce a report and recommendations which I think will be welcomed and timely.

I will not touch on the subject of forestry which is of vital interest both from considerations of trade and reforestation. I will deal only with the matter of agriculture. Everyone is aware that agriculture is in probably the most serious situation it has been in since the depression of the 1930s.

If we have any reason for being here, it is to express regional considerations. If ever there was a segment of our economy that needed discussing in view of the talk regarding free trade, the whole problem of the debt structure and the debt problems that farmers, especially in western Canada, find themselves facing, it is agriculture. People from the western region are crying for people to speak out and for those in authority to listen to what individual farmers and farm organizations are saying.

If ever there was a vital time to have a committee of the Senate studying purely agricultural matters, listening to problems and coming up with recommendations for the consideration of the government—not only the Government of Canada but the governments of the provinces—it is now. I hope that we can settle this matter and go back to where we were in terms of giving agriculture, forestry and fisheries a full voice. I do not mean to downgrade the fishery because I realize that it is of vital importance. But I do wish to put squarely on the table in the Senate, before the people and before the Government of Canada, the problems in the agricultural sector. I repeat that I do not think there was ever a time when it was more important to do so.

● (1550)

Honourable senators, I hope that we will finish this debate. I hope that we will support this motion, that we will set up the committee and that it will get moving on this vital matter.

I have been asked many questions, as I am sure other senators have, about what is happening to the Senate with regard to agricultural matters. I have been asked why the Senate is so silent in the face of the fantastic problems facing this industry in Canada. I have been asked why we have not been listening to farmers and speaking up for them. I hope that this situation will be corrected and I am sure that it will be very soon.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to respond. Perhaps Senator Steuart is not aware that Thursday afternoon has been allocated to the committee for issues relating to agriculture. He need only bring in a reference to that committee to initiate a study of any issue that he wants to bring up. He may also follow the procedure of an inquiry in the Senate chamber. There are many avenues he can follow to highlight the problems facing the agricultural sector.

I still recognize the importance of agriculture. It is very difficult to do everything in the amount of time committees have within which to do their work. I repeat that the committee does have a time block set aside on Thursday afternoons with which to deal with agricultural matters.

Senator Steuart should also recall that it was Senator Molgat who brought up the question when the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation was being discussed and an amendment came before the chamber. The Leader of the Government agreed that it would be referred to the committee. We have been dealing with that for a year. We cannot do everything at the same time. But I say again that there is no reason why we could not deal with agricultural matters on a Thursday afternoon.

Senator Steuart: In response to Senator Marshall's remarks, I hope I did not sound critical of the committee's giving a high priority to all questions regarding fisheries. We agreed to do so at the time the matter first came up. But I think the time has come to give a much higher priority, in terms of both what we do and what we appear to do, to agriculture.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Could Senator Marshall inform me whether there is an allocated time for the committee to meet on issues respecting forestry?

Senator Marshall: The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry has two time allocations, one at 11 o'clock Tuesday morning and one after the Senate rises or at 4 o'clock Thursday afternoon. I remind senators that we dealt with the herbicide report, which nobody outside this chamber paid much attention to, on a Thursday afternoon. If there is another order of reference to that committee, we will respond to it. I am sure that if it is important enough we will find time to deal with it.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, we have heard a lot in this chamber about the problems concerning agriculture. As many honourable senators are aware, there is an extreme problem in the forestry sector—one which extends beyond questions of trade. I have nothing against a special inquiry into agriculture, but I would impress upon honourable senators the grave situation facing our forestry industry. I would remind them of the misconceptions, particularly south of the border, about the Canadian forestry.

Senator Marshall: I could not agree more with Senator Sinclair. In the region of Newfoundland where I come from, the only stable industry is provided by the three paper mills there. I recognize the importance of that sector and the difficulties it faces for the future. It is all a matter of the time we have to spend on such matters. It is important that we should be flexible enough to deal with them all. I am ready to deal with them all.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I would like to make one comment. The committees of the Senate, for all intents and purposes, generally depend upon the chairmen to initiate this sort of thing. In this case—and I am not denigrating Senator Marshall for this—the chairman happens to be oriented more towards fisheries than towards agriculture. I think the main reason we need a separate committee for agriculture is so that there will be a chairman in place who will push these things and who will not wait for someone else to suggest an inquiry or put forward a reference.

Senator Marshall: I would like to point out to Senator Godfrey that when the present committee was originated there was already an agriculture committee. Someone in his wisdom decided to add to it fisheries and forestry. Here we are, three years later, going around the circle again back to where we started. That is fine, but perhaps whoever decided to do that in the first place should have been wiser in looking at the broad picture.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I think that Senator Marshall can answer his own question because he knows very well that this matter was raised some time ago. It was sent off to the committee under Senator Molgat, which looked at the situation, considered the options and came back with a report and a recommendation. The recommendation is contained in Order No. 16. We can argue all of that again if honourable senators so wish, but that was what the Senate decided, that was what the committee decided and here is the recommendation. In the name of common sense, I cannot understand why Senator Marshall wants to put forward all of the other ways in which to deal with the situation when the Senate committee has put a specific recommendation in front of us. I repeat that it is contained in Order No. 16. What Senator Godfrey has suggested is part of the reason why that is a valid recommendation before the Senate.

Now we need to get to it. We need to pass the motion so that all of the other requirements, such as those respecting a reorganization committee and so on, can be set up. The reasons for an agriculture committee are very simple and they are exactly the same reasons that were advanced so effectively by Senator Marshall on behalf of fisheries some time ago. One of those reasons is that we have a sector of an industry that is in grave economic difficulty. It is hurting and the people involved in it are being hurt severely. Therefore, we must set up a forum and a mechanism by which those people can appear to state their positions and the difficulties they find themselves facing.

I am sure that there are many ways, such as those which Senator Marshall has pointed out, in which to deal with this problem. Perhaps there are other ways, too. Perhaps some of the other committees, such as the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee or the Finance Committee, could take it on.

Senator Argue: They did that for 40 years.

Senator Olson: I know they did. But what we have before us is a specific motion contained in Order No. 16. That, I repeat, is the result of the consideration of both the Senate and the committee. Why do we not go forward with this and do it?
